Mr. McNARY. Did the Senator say in that discussion—my attention was distracted—that there is a provision there which permits the Secretary of Agriculture to control and say how such acreage shall be used over and above that which is required for domestic production?

Mr. SMITH. No; I said that if this plan were adopted the tax and the benefit would apply only to that proportion that was domestically consumed.

Mr. McNARY. That is correct.

Mr. SMITH. That the balance of it would take its chances with the world's price, whatever it might be.

Mr. McNARY. But there is no power conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture in this bill in any way to determine what use shall be made of excess acreage. I thought the Senator made that statement, and for that reason I asked the question; because the Senator will remember that as the first allotment bill passed the House, in January, it contained that unusual authority. When it reached the Senate it was stricken out, but nowhere does it appear in this bill. I thought the Senator was confused because the two bills came so closely together, this one having arbitrary power to be controlled by regulations of the Secretary, the other one having the set-up well defined and specified.

Mr. SMITH. I do stand corrected, Mr. President. I thought, after reading the bill, that this bill contained a provision that the owner of the land might plant it in any crop except a competitive one.

Mr. McNARY. No; that is not in this bill.

Mr. SMITH. Very well; then I stand corrected. That was in the original bill that we passed before.

Mr. McNARY. Yes; but under the power conferred by section 8 that might be one of the specifications or requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture, because carte blanche authority is granted to him here without specifications or limitations.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to call attention to another feature that appealed very powerfully to some of us.

Whatever tax is laid upon a given article in order to bring up the price to the pre-war parity there is immediately attached to the tariff on that product, in addition to the tariff already existing, the amount that is added to the price of the article by virtue of the imposition of the tax.

To illustrate, wheat now carries a tariff of 42 cents a bushel. If there should be imposed on wheat a tax of 48 cents in order to bring up its price to what was commonly discussed as the pre-war parity—namely, 90 cents—then there would automatically be placed on wheat a tariff of 90 cents a bushel.

In the case of cotton, ordinary middling upland cotton, as contradistinguished from long-staple cotton, bears no tariff. It is commonly estimated that the difference between the present price and the parity for the base period is 6 cents a pound, or $30 a bale. Therefore, immediately upon the proclamation by the Secretary of Agriculture that a tax of 6 cents is levied on the processing of cotton for domestic consumption a tariff of 6 cents a pound automatically goes on all cotton.

In the case of long-staple cotton, if the tariff now existing is 7 cents a pound and the processing tax imposed on that particular character of cotton to bring it to parity with the pre-war period should be 8 cents a pound, there would be automatically placed on the importation of that cotton a tariff of 15 cents per pound.

I thought that ought to be emphasized for the benefit of all parties concerned.

There is one other feature of the bill, and then I am through. I have tried to give the Senate, as nearly as may be, the two principles that were incorporated in the bill as received from the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the agreement feature or the license feature, I desire to ask him a question about the language on page 7. The language is, "unfair practices." Is that within the inclusion of the law that created the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. SMITH. I think it is.

Mr. FESS. In that case we are giving the matter of judgment as to unfair practices to the Secretary without reference to any judicial procedure at all. Would that be sound?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator, I take it that the terms of the license would come as near as may be to conforming to the provisions that will be found in reference to the Federal Trade Commission, and then the penalty would be attached in accordance with that; but to what extent the Secretary may go under this language I must admit that I do not know.

Mr. FESS. The power surely is here; but instead of leaving it to the Federal Trade Commission to determine whether there are unfair practices, that power is given to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will notice, the context says:

> Such licenses shall be subject to such terms and conditions, not in conflict with existing acts of Congress or regulations pursuant thereto, as may be necessary to eliminate unfair practices or charges.

That is the reason why I made the statement.

Mr. FESS. The question with me is, Who determines whether or not they are unfair practices or charges? That is the point.

Mr. SMITH. I presume it would be the courts that would have to decide that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Secretary would determine it in the first instance, but the party feeling himself aggrieved could appeal to the courts.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, that raises the very important question as to whether these decisions are subject to review by the courts. Is there not something in the bill that forbids that? I think there is. I think there is language here that forbids it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I am not a lawyer; but, no matter what language may be put in an act, I do not see how any language can deprive a citizen of his constitutional right to appeal to the courts for the protection of his rights.

Mr. FESS (reading):

> The Secretary of Agriculture may suspend or revoke any such license, after due notice and opportunity for hearing, for violations of the terms or conditions thereof. Any order of the Secretary suspending or revoking any such license shall be final if in accordance with law.

Mr. SMITH. As a matter of course. That is the very point I am making.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is true of any order he might make. It leaves it subject to final decision by the courts.

Mr. SMITH. Why, of course.

Mr. President, as I have said I have tried to give a fair, unbiased explanation of the principles of the bill thus far. There is one other that was incorporated by the committee which was not handed down by the Department of Agriculture, and that will be found on page 25, part 3. Before coming to that, however, I think it is fair to the Senate to give a very sketchy explanation of the provisions of the bill relative to floor stocks.

The language of the text explains itself, but it is provided here in the bill that any manufacturer in possession of goods to be manufactured at the time this bill goes into effect who has made contracts for the subsequent delivery of the manufactured article to be made out of the raw material in his possession when this bill goes into effect may sell the manufactured article according to contract, but that the vendee, the purchaser thereof, must pay the tax. I thought it was very proper that I should make that statement here, because it is a part of this proposition. Any manufacturer who has in his possession wheat or cotton or any other commodity enumerated in this bill against which he has already sold a bill for delivery in the finished form may deliver the product in its finished form according to contract, but the buyer thereof must pay the tax.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. What treatment is accorded the importer? Does he come under the processing provision?

Mr. SMITH. Oh, yes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I have found the section I had in mind, that was lurking somewhere in my mind, when I asked the question about the review.

Mr. SMITH. On what page is it?

Mr. FESS. Page 14, where—

> The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, with the approval of the President, to make such regulations with the force and effect of law as may be necessary to carry out the powers vested in him by this title. Any violation of any regulation shall be subject to such penalty, not in excess of $100, as may be provided therein.

Then subsection (e)—

The action of any officer, employee, or agent in determining the amount of and in making any rental or benefit payment shall not be subject to review by any officer of the Government other than the Secretary of Agriculture or Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] says that he is thoroughly familiar with that provision, and I will ask him to answer the Senator's question. It is on page 14, paragraph (e).

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, the explanation was made that the Comptroller General's Office ordinarily has power to review contracts, and that without this section the bill would impose upon his Office the necessity of reviewing every individual contract made with a producer. The purpose of this section is to obviate the necessity of that, to save all that detail work.

Mr. FESS. I see that that would be applicable. The Comptroller General is the final judge as to whether a payment should be made under any legislation. He examines whether it is in accordance with law; and the object of this provision is to avoid throwing all of these matters into that office.

Mr. MURPHY. Precisely.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the language of subsection (c) is very unusual, it seems to me—that regulations can be made by the Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the President, " with the force and effect of law ", and there will be a penalty of $100 for violating them. Nobody knows what the regulation is going to be. It is to be made by the Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the President. It is a mere regulation, but it is to have the force and effect of law, with a penalty attached.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, that is clearly within the limitation of the other section to which reference has been made. It does not authorize the Secretary to make any regulations in violation of this proposed law or of any other law. It simply gives him the power to make regulations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the proposed law.

I do not conceive that the words " with the force and effect of law " are very material. The legal effect of the language employed would be substantially the same without those words. It is necessary to give the Secretary the power to make regulations. That is done in every act we pass which involves any discretion on the part of the administrative officer. The Congress has passed a number of statutes, some of them within my memory, which have contained language identical or almost identical with this language.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Senator's explanation I think is satisfactory. The thing which intrigued my attention was the language " with the force and effect of law."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Those words have heretofore been used in statutes. I could cite one or two of them, but will not attempt to do so unless challenged. My construction of it is simply this, that it gives the Secretary very broad power to make rules and regulations which have the effect of law, but he cannot make any rule or regulation that is in violation of law. The object of it is to compel observance of the regulations and the rules which the Secretary makes.

Mr. FESS. In other words, the Senator means that a law is in existence, and the Secretary is authorized, with the approval of the President, to make regulations to enforce it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is correct.

Mr. FESS. The use of the words " force and effect of law ", and attaching a penalty, was the thing that struck me.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has in his mind a thought well worthy of consideration, whether we wish to give the Secretary a power to make a rule or a regulation, the violation of which carries a penalty, but if we do not do that, we will be compelled to write into the statute rules and regulations, and make them penal by express provision of the measure in order to assure their observance.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, there is one element which perhaps it is hardly necessary for me to call attention to. Provision is made that the processors may receive from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation funds sufficient to meet their needs between the time the tax goes on and the ultimate regulation of the sale of the goods subsequent to the imposition of the tax. They are allowed to borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the interim to meet the obligation, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to borrow to meet current expenses, until such time as the tax will afford money sufficient to liquidate the expenses.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, has the Senator any estimate as to the amount of money that will be required as an initial appropriation?

Mr. SMITH. There is none fixed in this bill.

Mr. FESS. There is a practical question in my mind which I think the Senator discussed a moment ago. The wheat grower sells his wheat to the miller. Suppose the current price is 50 cents. The miller pays the grower 50 cents. If the exchange price is 98 cents, there is a differential of 48 cents. When is that 48 cents paid?

Mr. SMITH. That 48 cents is paid when the miller processes that wheat, upon that portion of it domestically consumed, after he has processed it.

Mr. FESS. Wherein comes the certificate that is issued?

Mr. SMITH. The processor will send an amount of money equal to the tax upon all the wheat processed by him for domestic consumption. When he remits that to the proper authority—I presume to the Secretary of the Treasury, who has first loaned the money—then the Secretary of the Treasury will transmit to the commissioner or to the Secretary of Agriculture for the allocation of that fund amongst those who hold the certificates.

Mr. FESS. The grower of the wheat does not wait for any length of time for the 48 cents?

Mr. SMITH. He has to wait for the 48 cents until the tax may be collected and sent to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the secretary of the Treasury then transmits it to the proper distributing officer.

Mr. FESS. Is the miller the collecting agency from the Treasury to pay to the grower?

Mr. SMITH. The miller is the man who pays the tax to the Secretary of the Treasury upon the estimated amount he has converted for domestic purposes.

Mr. FESS. Money cannot be gotten out of the Treasury except by appropriation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If a certificate is issued, the holder of the certificate in all probability can take it to a bank and get the money on it at a discount.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, yes; he could discount it; but the ultimate settlement of it has to go through the process I have just described.

Mr. FESS. The certificate will be a governmental obligation?

Mr. SMITH. A Government obligation.

Mr. FESS. How much of an agency will it take to enforce this proposed law? How much of a bureau is it going to take to enforce it?

Mr. SMITH. I cannot enter into the realm of speculation along that line. That will have to be determined by the actual practice. I have not even heard it estimated with any seriousness.

Mr. FESS. The bill itself actually makes an appropriation, does it not?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is it not unusual to make an appropriation authorizing drawing money out of the Treasury before it is collected?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, to what section is the Senator referring?

Mr. FESS. It is the appropriation section.

Mr. SMITH. There is no definite amount specified.

Mr. FESS. It is on page 16, line 22.

Mr. SMITH. The language is:

The proceeds derived from taxes imposed under this act, or so much thereof as may be necessary, are hereby appropriated.

Mr. FESS. That is the point, "are hereby appropriated."

Mr. SMITH. That is the proceeds from the tax.

Mr. FESS. The tax is not yet collected, but we are asked to make an appropriation.

Mr. SMITH. It is the proceeds derived from taxes.

Mr. FESS. Why should we not authorize it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In order to prevent the necessity for the passage of another measure appropriating it. This is a quicker method.

Mr. SMITH. I think this is thoroughly practical, because it will depend upon the taxes.

Now, Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, before the Senator goes to the next session, may I inquire whether there are any circumstances under which the proceeds of the processing tax might not be sufficient to meet the obligation of the bill?

Mr. SMITH. Unhesitatingly I answer that there might be, and in that case we would have to appeal, under a deficiency bill, or otherwise, for an amount of money necessary to make up the difference. But the proponents of the bill seem to think that the tax paid will be sufficient to cover the expenses.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator think so himself?

Mr. SMITH. The Senator's opinion will be voiced at another time. I should rather prefer to see how they are going to operate this measure before I give my opinion.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I join the Senator in that, and I should like to wait until I see how they operate before I vote on it, if I could.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I think I have covered the main features of the bill, with the exception of what the committee put in on its own motion, which is found on page 25, under the caption "Cost of Production."

Of course, not much explanation is needed of this portion of the bill. It simply provides that there should be estimated the cost of production of the various articles included in the bill and that the Secretary of Agriculture shall fix the cost-of-production price of those articles, for that part of them which is domestically consumed.

I have refrained from commenting on any features of the bill except to try to give to the Senate an explanation of the principles involved. The only principle involved here is the ascertainment, as near as may be, of the cost of production, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, under this text, when that cost of production is so ascertained, to proclaim that as being the price for the article to be charged in this country, to the extent of that part of it domestically consumed. As to the exportable surplus, of course, that will be sold in accordance with the world price pertaining to the article.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. This section applies, does it not, to any basic agricultural commodity?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; it does.

Mr. VANDENBERG. So that when we finally reach the end of this bill, instead of being limited to seven commodities, it will include all commodities which are basic to agriculture?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And all processing related thereto, and all competition of that processing.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, so that there may be no misunderstanding, I direct the Senator's attention to section 11, on page 16, which defines the term "basic agricultural commodity."

Mr. SMITH. Frankly, I must admit that, in the discussion of this new feature—I, of course, will stand corrected by any member of the committee if I am wrong—my understanding of this section, known as the price section, was that it did not pertain to articles enumerated in the bill, but to all basic agricultural articles of whatever nature.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On further examination, I notice that the section to which I referred describes the basic agricultural commodities as used in that title.

Mr. SMITH. That is what I thought.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The cost-of-production plan appears to be in a different title.

Mr. SMITH. My impression was that under this plan, which was commonly known as a "modification" of the Simpson and Clair plan, all basic agricultural commodities would come under that provision when the cost of production was ascertained, and then that would be proclaimed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and that would be maintained for all parts of any given commodity, so far as the domestic-consumption portion of it was concerned.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator give me his opinion as to the correct answer to this question? If the Secretary of Agriculture finds that the cost of production under part 3 is higher than the base price identified in previous sections, does the Senator think that the Secretary would be called upon to go to the cost of production as his base?

Mr. SMITH. My impression is that the cost-of-production section has no reference whatever to any other part of this bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator does not apprehend my question. Here are various responsibilities put upon the Secretary of Agriculture. If finally he finds that the cost of production of a basic agricultural commodity is higher than the base price identified in the other plans, does the Senator think that the Secretary is directed or required, by the spirit of the proposed act, to use the cost-of-production price—in other words, the higher cost?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I do.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator thinks he is?

Mr. SMITH. I think that is the purpose of this provision.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then the Senator's opinion is that at any time the cost of production is found to be higher than the base rate part 3 supersedes the balance of the bill?

Mr. SMITH. If he accepts that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, Mr. President, with the Senator's permission, I think a wrong construction is being placed on this entirely.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am trying to find out.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Part 3 is an alternative proposition. If part 3 stays in the bill, the Secretary of Agriculture may either resort to the cost-of-production plan for the purpose of determining the benefits and proceedings under the bill or he may prefer to act under the so-called "allotment plan" or "fair-exchange-value-plan"; but it does not contemplate that he shall proceed under both, and it is his option to proceed under the one he prefers.

Mr. SMITH. That is exactly the point I made.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I beg the Senator's pardon, but the Senator from Michigan asked if the Secretary would be compelled to take the cost-of-production plan if he found that would result in higher prices.

Mr. SMITH. Then I did not understand the question. Once he has adopted the cost-of-production plan in reference to any article or all of them, then the cost-of-production plan would be applied without regard whatever to the previous price.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If he accepts one plan, he would proceed without reference to the other plan and not accept it. If he adopts the fair-exchange-value plan, he will not act upon the cost-of-production plan. They are in the alternative and were put into the bill with that understanding. The cost-of-production plan is entirely different in its results from the fair-exchange-value plan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Ordinarily the cost-of-production plan would be more favorable to the farmer than the other plan in dollars and cents—at least it would so appear on the face of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not think that is true. Some who advocate the cost-of-production plan insist that it costs 23 cents a pound to produce cotton now and $1.50 a bushel to produce wheat at this time. I know that anyone who makes that contention does not know anything about cost of production. Anyone who says it costs 23 cents a pound to produce cotton under present conditions, in my opinion, is not entitled to recognition as a scientist, an economist, or an expert. The same is true, in my judgment, with respect to the cost of production of wheat. It does not cost anything like 23 cents a pound to produce cotton under present or recent conditions, and every ordinary cotton farmer in the South knows that my statement is correct.

It does not cost $1.50 a bushel to produce wheat now, and I believe, though I am not so well-informed upon that subject as upon cotton, that most of the wheat farmers would agree to that statement. The cost-of-production plan, if it is to be based upon any such figures as that, is an impracticable plan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Upon what is it based under the terms of part III of the bill? Can the Senator indicate?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What the cost of production may be is, of course, difficult to determine. The cost under given conditions is less than under other conditions. It would be difficult, in my judgment, to arrive at a fair basis of cost of production because there are just as many standards as there are producers.

Mr. SMITH. May I state to the Senator from Michigan that the cost of producing cotton, with which I am fairly familiar, just about equalizes itself throughout the several phases even in the West where they do not use fertilizer. Production per acre is less than where we use fertilizer. Their labor cost is higher where they do not use fertilizer than where we use it. When all of the elements are taken together, they fairly equalize themselves. I would presume that taxes, investment, interest on investment, cost of labor in every form, and other things taken into consideration would about equalize themselves.

When I refer to cost of labor in every form, I mean to include not only the one who plows in the field but the pickers, who are not producers but are called in to help gather the crop, and others all along the line. The Senator will understand what an army it takes when human fingers touch every bit of the 16,000,000-bale crop. The cotton is then taken to the gin and put through the various processes. All of those elements would be taken into consideration in determining the average cost per pound in arriving at the basis of return upon the investment, labor, and all the other elements entering into the matter.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It would have to be an average cost, would it not?

Mr. SMITH. Oh, yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is so much diversity in the cost of production as between producers themselves and as between different soils and different sections, that there is no such thing as cost of production except based upon an average.

Mr. SMITH. That is true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The average would be difficult to ascertain.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Would it be a fair interpretation of part III to say that it is entirely and exclusively at the option of the Secretary of Agriculture whether he shall use part III?

Mr. SMITH. That is true.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I inquire whether it is a fact that the Secretary of Agriculture has opposed part III and did not recommend its inclusion in the bill?

Mr. SMITH. All I can state is that he did not recommend the inclusion of it in the bill. Just what his attitude is I am not advised; I do not know.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator does not care to state his own attitude in respect to it, does he?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me I think I can state with assurance to the Senator that the Secretary of Agriculture is opposed to the inclusion of part III in the bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am not asking the Senator's assurance. I do not want to fool the farmer on the bill. I should like to make it plain, if it is the fact, that the Secretary is opposed to it as the Senator from Alabama now states; and since it is at his option exclusively, therefore we may contemplate that he does not intend to use it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I cannot tell anything about his contemplation. My information is as I have stated.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. I will answer as to the attitude of the Secretary of Agriculture. He is most anxious to secure for the farmer the highest price possible for the farmer to get. In the parity price he purposes, or the bill purposes, a step-up in the price as the consuming power of the people can consume the commodity until final parity is reached. The Secretary of Agriculture would rather not be charged with the administrative task of dealing on the one hand with the parity price and on the other hand with those who demand cost of production and whose ideas of cost of production may differ from his. To repeat, the objective he seeks is the highest possible price for the farmer to obtain, considering the ability of consumers to absorb commodities.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] speaks with more intimate knowledge than I have of the attitude of the Secretary of Agriculture, because the Senator happens to hail from the Secretary's home State and has doubtless conferred with him more intimately than I have.

I think I have said enough in reference to the purposes of the bill, but I do want to break my promise to the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] about the farm credits. I want to make one statement in justice to our committee. There was considerable discussion in reference to the effect of the proposed credits, and I will state it now and the Senate will then deal with it as it sees fit.

Under the terms of the bill, the main purpose is to scale down the interest and the investment so as to enable the mortgagor to have relief that will really amount to some real considerable relief. In reference to the private mortgagee or mortgageholder, under the terms of the bill, he may agree to have the capital investment scaled down and the interest as well, because under the terms of the proposed plan the Government is to assume or guarantee the interest on the bonds issued for the refunding of the mortgages, whether scaled down or not. That would pertain to all private mortgages as contradistinguished from joint-stock land-bank and Federal land-bank mortgages. That would pertain to all private mortgagees, insurance companies, private individuals, investing companies, but does not pertain to the Federal land banks. No provision is made in the bill for the scaling down of the face of the mortgage of anyone who holds a mortgage of this kind in and under the Federal land banks. That was a matter of considerable discussion before the committee, many of them thinking that provision ought to be made that all mortgage holders, suffering as they are from investments that may possibly never be paid, should have a reduction in the face of the mortgage as well as release from the rate of interest.

Mr. President, with that explanation I should like to have the bill considered for action on the committee amendments up to the mortgage feature.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment of the committee is, on page 3, line 8, to strike out the heading "Title I Cotton option contracts", and insert "Part 1—Cotton option contracts".

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] is laboring under a misapprehension as to some of the provisions of the bill. He referred to the definition of basic agricultural commodities. The Senator will note on page 27 there appears the line "title II", but the provisions he referred to, including the definition of basic agricultural commodities, are in title I, as well as the so-called "Simpson plan" being incorporated in title I. The definitions are very clearly set forth so that there can be no misunderstanding as to what the Simpson plan refers to when it refers to basic agricultural commodities which are enumerated on page 16.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas obtained the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	King	Robinson, Ark.
Ashurst	Couzens	La Follette	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Cutting	Lewis	Russell
Bachman	Dickinson	Logan	Schall
Bailey	Dieterich	Lonergan	Sheppard

Carey	Hebert	Patterson	Walsh
Clark	Johnson	Pittman	Wheeler
Connally	Kean	Pope	White
Coolidge	Kendrick	Reed
Copeland	Keyes	Reynolds

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, before I was interrupted for the purpose of a roll call, the statement had been made that any effort to work out legislation designed and calculated to improve business conditions and restore confidence leads one directly to the problem as it is related to the prices of farm commodities.

For 12 long years we have probed the agricultural situation; we have accumulated a mountain of depressing statistics; we have said that so grievous a state of affairs must not be permitted to continue; but we have permitted it to continue for more than a decade. It has been roundly asserted that no nation can prosper so long as its agriculture does not prosper, yet we acted during the fat years up to October 1929 as if agriculture's plight was of no consequence to the rest of the economic structure.

It is not suggested in these remarks that Congress has not legislated upon the problem during the past 12 years. It has, of course, but its major efforts have been frustrated either by the administration in power or by the failure of the legislation itself to comprehend economic realities.

Today, Mr. President, we have a united people behind the Congress and behind the administration. The national stage is set for action. The disposition is to face economic realities. We are determined to take the best steps possible to restore national prosperity, and I assert with confidence that the first essential step is the restoration of the farmer's buying power. On that consummation economic recovery and progress depend. On that point the record and the implications of the past decade speak clearly; and the people of the United States, by an overwhelming decision last November, have spoken to the same end with equal clarity and with even more compelling vigor. We have a mandate from the people to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power. That is the purpose of one of the provisions of the bill now before the Senate.

In this speech it is not my intention to go into the cost-of-production plan or the features of the bill which have relation to refinancing farm mortgages, but my remarks now will be limited to a discussion of the general principles underlying and having relation to what is termed by some the "fair-exchange-value plan" comprehended in this bill.

The reason for so restricting my present remarks grows out of the fact that there is much doubt and confusion concerning the feature of the bill referred to. It is, without question, an experiment. The measure may or may not prove effective in accomplishing the purposes for which it is proposed to be enacted. Upon the spirit and manner of its administration, quite as much as upon the powers conferred by the bill on its administrators, perhaps even more, depends the success of this effort to revitalize agriculture.

The effort to revitalize agriculture cannot be rested on any political consideration. I should hold myself in utter contempt if, moved by any consideration of political advantage either for myself or for my party, I sought to secure the enactment of the provisions in the bill. It is sufficient for present purposes to state that, notwithstanding important efforts have been made to restore the parity between agriculture and other industries, efforts extending throughout the entire post-war period, those efforts have not proved fruitful. Disparity still exists; it threatens to continue. I shall not censure any Senator who, upon an examination of the features of the bill to which my remarks have reference, reaches the conclusion that the bill will follow in failure of wholesome results those other measures which, with more or less confidence, have been advanced in this body and in the body at the other end of the Capitol for the purpose of restoring agriculture to its proper relation with other industries.

My effort now is to answer, if I can, some of the arguments which here in recent days, and elsewhere at other times, have been urged against any action related in nature to the plan to which my remarks have reference.

Let me examine in some detail the goal of parity which the bill sets up.

In many respects the parity provision is the heart of this bill. This declaration is not intended to apply to that title in the bill, inserted by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, which has relation to the refinancing of farm mortgages. In justice to my own views, long entertained, it should be said in this connection that the refinancing of farm mortgages is believed to be necessary and helpful in the operation of the parity provisions of this bill.

Some suggestions will be made as to how the bill may be administered. Finally, I shall attempt to discuss the imperative necessity for preserving in the bill those provisions which permit flexibility of administration.

Let me first, however, recognize the attitude of those whose instinctive inclination it is to oppose this measure or any other measure which would affect the operation of the so-called "natural" economic forces. They prefer to let nature take its course, ignoring, apparently, what happens to mankind in the meantime. They speak with considerable effectiveness of the return of our export trade in farm products as the more natural method of restoring farm purchasing power.

There is an overwhelming sentiment in favor of the restoration of our export trade in farm products. To effect that restoration is indeed a chief objective of the present administration. We will unquestionably make progress in that direction; but negotiating reciprocal tariffs is not done overnight. The whole complex welter of trade restrictions in Europe against our exports cannot be wiped out in any short period.

Some months ago I saw a map of Europe which had been prepared to show what was happening to our European market for wheat. Heavy shading marked the countries which had imposed trade regulations on wheat by means of import duties, milling quotas, or similar devices. Countries in which no such restrictions existed were left white. How many countries, do you suppose, showed white on the map? Exactly two—Denmark and the Irish Free State. The rest of Europe was a maze of barriers against our wheat; and if that map were to be brought up to date, it would show only Denmark free of restrictions. (The map did not reveal, of course, the trade barriers created by depreciated currencies.)

What is true of wheat is more or less true of most of our major farm-product exports. These trade regulations and restrictions are the heritage of a disastrous war and melancholy proof that wars do not end when the peace treaties are signed. These barriers likewise tell of unfortunate policies pursued by the world's largest creditor nation as well as of the hysterical desire of some European nations for a larger measure of economic self-sufficiency.

Is it reasonable to assume that the foreign-trade situation so complex, so patently a product of many factors and of the whole post-war period can be cleared up overnight? We deceive ourselves tragically if we think so. Progress in this field will be measured, not in days and months but in years.

And yet some will say, "Let the economic forces alone; let them bring about automatically the necessary readjustments."

That is a comfortable point of view—unless you happen to be on the receiving end of the readjustment—but it is not a view that bears much relation to the facts.

The truth is that today, as for many years past, automatic readjustments are, and for years to come will continue to be, impossible. How slowly the law of supply and demand works in the face of multitudinous trade barriers! What incentive is there for a producer to reduce his production, to further the automatic readjustments, so long as his fixed charges remain so far out of line?

There was a time, I grant you, when changes in price were dominant in controlling production and consumption and in tending to bring them to a balance; but today the international markets are characterized by the almost universal presence of political restrictions. So numerous are they, so constantly do they interfere with trade, that the ability of prices to control economic activity is seriously weakened.

All of us, Mr. President, would vastly prefer to let things work themselves out and to permit the farm problem to solve itself through the operation of the law of supply and demand. The fly in the ointment is that the law of supply and demand under existing world conditions cannot possibly operate as we wish it to.

According to that law, low prices cause consumption to increase and production to decrease. There then results a new situation in which the quantity produced and the quantity consumed are again in balance. The automatic readjustment, in other words, has worked very neatly.

That is the theory. It can be found in most of the old textbooks, early in the book, sharply segregated from the facts to be found in the world about us. The facts reveal that for the past few years low prices have not stimulated consumption of farm products.

Prices to farmers have fallen on the average by 61 percent, but food prices to consumers have fallen only 36 percent. City incomes, unfortunately, have fallen by more than 36 percent, so city consumers have bought less rather than more. The relatively rigid distribution charges, it appears, have introduced a problem generally ignored by most statements of the law of supply and demand.

Freight rates have been maintained with almost no reductions; commissions and other marketing costs have been reduced but little. The reduction in prices to the farmer could not, because of those rigid intervening costs, stimulate a corresponding increase in consumption.

Even aside from this, the reductions in our prices have been more than counterbalanced by the rising foreign tariffs and trade restrictions and by exchange difficulties. The free market, of which the classical theorists love to speak, nowadays exists only in theory.

Those who argue that we should rely on the operation of "natural laws" alone, at a time when almost every other nation on the globe is effectively obstructing the operation of these so-called "laws", are surely living in a dream world where fantasy and delusion are substituted for facts and realities. Those do-nothings are hopelessly impractical theorists posing as hard-headed practical men.

Low prices for farm products have not only failed to stimulate consumption but they have also failed to discourage production. Index numbers prepared by the Department of Agriculture show no decline in farm production in 1930 or 1931 as compared with earlier years, and only a very slight decline in 1932, due primarily to unfavorable weather, with resulting short crops of wheat and cotton. The individual farmer does not see that his relatively small output affects the market price. What he does see, however, is the ever-present burden of fixed charges, interest, and taxes. He is driven, inevitably, to produce as much as he can to pay these charges. Even if he loses his farm, he or some other farmer takes it over and tries to make it pay as much as it can on some new arrangement with the holder of the mortgage.

It remains, therefore, a stubborn truth, that when prices are not free to reflect production, overproduction will not be corrected. That is our situation today; and that is the economic reality which this measure, unlike previous farm-relief measures, adequately and intelligently recognizes.

Let me summarize, at this point, the contents of the bill. Its purpose is to jar the Nation loose from the iron grip of economic depression by increasing agricultural purchasing power. It proposes to accomplish this end by restoring the balance between the production and the consumption of farm products. The effect of balancing production with market requirements will be to increase farm prices, and thereby to increase the farmers' income.

What is required of the producing machinery of agriculture, then, is an orderly retreat of that portion of our acreage or production which cannot, during the period of this emergency, be disposed of at an adequate price. But there is no incentive for the individual farmer to reduce his acreage or control his production under existing conditions. We, therefore, attempt to provide the incentive, and this the present bill does by compensating the farmer in accordance with the reduction he effects in acreage or production. The funds for that compensation, or adjustment benefit, will come from a tax on the first processed form of each commodity whose production has been brought under control.

I am assuming that it is not necessary to discuss at any length the importance to the Nation of a restoration of agricultural purchasing power. All discussion on this point begins and ends with the compelling fact that 44 percent of the Nation's population lives on farms or in small rural communities, wherein incomes fluctuate directly with farm income; that the drop in farm prices has wiped out about half of the buying power of this 44 percent of the population; and that this drastic shrinkage in buying power may account for as much as half of our unemployment. It has been conservatively estimated that some 4,000,000 city workers owe their unemployment to the decline in rural buying power, and that an additional two and a half million city workers are out of jobs for the same reason.

The heart of the bill, as I see it, is the parity provision, contained in the declaration of policy. Let me quote it:

SEC. 2. It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress—

(1) To establish and maintain such balance between the production and consumption of agricultural commodities, and such marketing conditions therefor, as will reestablish prices to farmers at a level that will give agricultural commodities a purchasing power with respect to articles that farmers buy, equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the base period. The base period in the case of all agricultural commodities except tobacco shall be the pre-war period, August 1909–July 1914. In the case of tobacco, the base period shall be the post-war period, September 1919–August 1928.

Here is a statement which goes to the very root of this and all other economic depressions. The premise is that price disparity is a major factor in a depression, and a great obstacle to recovery. The conclusion is that we must, as rapidly and as completely as possible, remove that disparity. It would be just as true if, by some chance, farm prices were relatively much higher than industrial prices. In that case either farm prices would have to come down or industrial prices would have to go up. Today we face this dilemma: Either industrial prices must be brought down or farm prices must be raised. By some means they must be brought closer to parity. We cannot budge from the present economic depression until one or the other is done. Which do you prefer? There is only one answer, and that is the answer provided by the sections of the bill which I am attempting to discuss.

An important consideration is the point at which parity may be and should be established. Whether we aim at the price relationships of the pre-war or the post-war period, of any one year or a group of years, we must be sure of our ground.

The base period selected by this measure, 1909–14, has not been selected by chance. The exception made for tobacco is a special case, and I shall mention it in a moment.

Indeed, it has already been discussed; questions have been asked and answered. It so happens that during that pre-war period the prices of the things the farmer sold and the prices of the things he bought were in the most satisfactory exchange relationship that had been achieved up to that time. So far as price relationships were concerned, the buying power of both farmer and city worker was functioning smoothly and effectively. We seemed to have reached the point in this period when both agriculture and industry were prospering on even terms. The Nation, a as result, was on even keel insofar as its economic course was concerned.

The index of commodity prices mirrored this situation when it registered the prices of farm products and of industrial products both hovering close to 100. Neither group wavered more than 5 points above or below that point during the 5 pre-war years. Today the prices farmers pay are at once more within striking distance of the hundred mark on the commodity index, but the prices farmers receive for their products are below 50 on the index.

A glance at the history of prices over the past century and a half is illuminating. If you will study such a price chart, you will at once be struck by the very evident attempt of prices to reach that level finally attained in 1909–14. Wars and economic depressions caused violent fluctuations, but prices continued to move toward that level which promised some stability.

Thus, throughout the century preceding 1910, farm prices followed a rising trend. There were long ups and downs, of course, but the trend of the century was upward. The European demand for our exports and our own rapidly growing home market provided a sound base for such an upward trend.

Industrial prices, meanwhile, were either tending downward or were not rising as fast as farm prices. The two lines seemed to be struggling to meet. They finally did, and the price relationships that obtained during 1909–14, which we have since come to consider as the base period, resulted. Thus you have some of the reasons for the base period incorporated in the bill.

The World War provided another violent fluctuation. Ever since then, however, the two lines of prices have been moving toward the pre-war base.

The point I wish to establish is that this pre-war base is the last benchmark, the best price relationship we have ever attained. Unless we propose to make a basic change in our agricultural economy, or to ignore the social along with the economic effects of a depression, we ought to attempt to return to and hold fast to that benchmark.

It is also true that in the life of the present generation of farmers no other period offers so much stability. Would you select as a base period the war years or the period of the first postwar depression or the fat industrial years up to 1929? By the process of elimination, assuming, as one must, that we are to restrict ourselves to this generation, there is no period at all comparable with the pre-war period for purposes of stability and equality. That was a point of adjustment which, had not the war intervened, we might have consolidated and perpetuated. In that time there was a healthy balance between producing groups and a vigorous flow of trade. For the sake of our economic health, we must restore that parity between the prices of the things the farmer sells and the prices of the things he buys.

To call this choice of a base period arbitrary or to go a step farther and call the commodity-price index meaningless, as some have, is to betray a singular ignorance of the relations between agriculture and industry throughout the years. To anyone who appreciates these relationships the commodity-price index is full of meaning. It indicates now that, while the farmer continues to labor and produce, the buying power of his products has dropped to an undeniably low level, in terms of the commodities for which he ordinarily exchanges his products.

The farmer, in other words, takes a greatly reduced wage for his labor and a greatly reduced return, or even a loss, upon his capital, whereas industry simply shuts down and refuses to operate for lower returns. Laborers are discharged because the products of industry cannot be sold at the prices industry insists upon maintaining for these products.

The operators of industrial plants say they cannot produce and sell for less than cost of production, and yet they take great losses through idleness rather than attempt to operate and take a reduction in the prices of their products comparable to the reduction the farmer takes. Railroad rates remain high, so high that in many cases the price of the farm product in the central market will hardly pay the freight.

Industry, it seems, prefers a large measure of unemployment and of loss through idleness rather than the necessary downward readjustment in prices that a depression always entails. Organized labor, by and large, seems to prefer maintaining a relatively high wage level for those who are employed, rather than take the considerable reductions that lower prices for the products of labor would entail.

The farmer is both laborer and capitalist. Yet he cannot, even if he would, pursue the policy apparently preferred by industry. He cannot rid himself of his costs of production by turning men out. It is doubtful if he would, even if he could. He cannot keep his prices up, nor can he, acting as an individual, prevent overproduction and ever lower prices.

I imagine we would all suffer less in a depression if we could all continue to work on a readjusted program, with wages, prices, interest rates, and taxes all leveled down—or up, as the case may be—to the point necessary to maintain a continuous flow of goods and services into use.

I doubt if it is possible to overemphasize the significance of this concept of parity, and, conversely, the disturbing effect of disparity and of inflexible prices. The relative inflexibility of industrial prices as compared with farm prices operates as a double-barreled shotgun, and the load from both barrels seems to lodge in the farmer. Industrial prices, being relatively inflexible, do not fall as fast or as far as farm prices in a depression. Disparity results, and the farmer feels the effect of one barrel from that shotgun. Industrial prices are part of many of the farmer's costs. His bills for machinery, for fertilizer, for shoes and clothing, for automobiles and gasoline—these charges are, by comparison, rather inflexible. That is the other barrel from that economic shotgun. He feels the shock both when he sells and when he buys.

In fact, as our economic system has developed, the flexible element in industry has come to be volume of production and, therefore, employment; prices, meanwhile, remaining relatively rigid. In agriculture, the flexible element has come to be price; the inflexible factor, volume of production. In many an industrial enterprise it has been the increase or decrease in volume, rather than in price, that has made profit possible.

The measure before us, it is important to note, does not concern itself primarily with prices but rather with purchasing power. Wheat at a dollar and shoes at $4 are the same exchange relationship as wheat at 50 cents and shoes at $2. But wheat at 50 cents and shoes at $3—that is a different matter. We are concerned, therefore, with price relationships rather than with prices per se.

Under the terms of the bill the fair exchange price of wheat according to the pre-war base should be today around 90 cents a bushel; of cotton, between 12 and 13 cents a pound; of hogs, around $7.30 a hundredweight; and so on.

Tobacco, as the bill implies, is a special case. The tremendous increase in cigarette consumption since the war period has radically altered the relationship of tobacco prices to other prices. Cigarette consumption in the pre-war years represented about 5 or 6 percent of the consumption of flue-cured Burley, and Maryland tobaccos. In recent years cigarettes have consumed from 50 to 60 percent of the domestic consumption of these types.

Along with this change in use, changes in methods and costs of production were necessary. To produce the kinds of leaf suitable for use in cigarettes it was necessary for growers of burley to change from high-yielding to low-yielding varieties. Thus average yields per acre declined from 865 pounds per acre in 1909–13 to 790 pounds in 1928–32. Increased costs of production necessarily resulted. Changes in harvesting methods, such as the change from stalk cutting to priming, by growers of flue-cured types greatly increased costs.

To place the base period for tobacco prices in the pre-war period, therefore, would be to ignore a far-reaching change in the whole tobacco situation. The most representative period for the tobacco grower, in the judgment of the economists of the Department of Agriculture, is the longer period from 1919–28.

The parity prices quoted a moment ago for wheat and cotton and hogs, to confine myself to a few examples, are double or more than double the present prices received by producers. Unless one has carefully read the bill and has some familiarity with the intentions of those who must administer it, one might jump to rash conclusions on hearing those parity prices quoted. Let me say at the outset that they are a goal, and a goal to be reached step by step, as said by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], with the interests of the consumer thoroughly in mind. Certainly the declaration of policy in this measure is a guaranty that the interests of the consumer will be protected.

Some people may be tempted to draw rash conclusions from the parity prices quoted. Upon learning that the parity price of wheat is double the present farm price they may draw all manner of strange conclusions about the effect of this—through the processing tax applied to flour; that is, on the price of bread.

In 1914, by way of illustration, No. 2 Hard Winter wheat sold at Kansas City at 93 cents a bushel. Flour sold at Kansas City at $4.36 a barrel. Bread sold at Kansas City at 6.1 cents a pound.

In December 1932 No. 2 Hard Winter wheat sold at Kansas City at 42 cents a bushel. Flour sold at Kansas City at $3.40 a barrel, and bread sold in the same city at 6.7 cents a pound, or six tenths of a cent per pound higher than it sold for when wheat was 93 cents instead of 42 cents per bushel.

With a wheat price in 1932, 54.5 percent below 1914, we have a flour price 22.2 percent below and a bread price 9.8 percent above. The drop in the price level has been accomplished almost wholly at the expense of the farmer and the consumer. The spread between them has increased; the farmer gets less, the consumer pays more. Kansas City bread prices, furthermore, are of particular significance, for both in 1914 and in December 1932 they were identical with the average for the United States.

Much the same is true of a more recent period, comparing 1928 with 1932. Thus, in 1928 the wheat producer's share of the retail price of bread in New York City was 1.9 cents a loaf. By October 1932 the producer's share had dropped to six tenths of a cent per loaf. The share retained by bakers, millers, transporters, and distributors meanwhile fell from 7.2 cents in 1928 to 6.1 cents in 1932. These agencies lost 1.1 cents out of an initial share of 7.2 cents, while the farmer lost 1.3 cents out of an initial share of 1.9 cents.

In common decency, to say nothing of justice, should not some of that microscopic share be restored to the farmer? Is there a consumer in the United States who would protest? Is it fair, in the light of these facts, for processors to attempt to frighten consumers into believing that once this bill passes, prices of flour, and bread will double?

Review some of the retail-price indexes and compare them with the index of prices received by farmers. The index of farm prices, as we know, is below 50. The index of most retail prices is 100 or better. Thus bread and flour, on the retail-price index, stand at 103; dairy products at 99; pork and lard, 72—low, to be sure, but still almost double the farm-price index.

The situation in tobacco products, especially cigarettes, requires a word. The price of cigarette tobaccos was cut in half from 1928 to 1931; the selling price of cigarettes at wholesale—before the recent decline—was steadily advanced. From 1928 to 1931 the manufacturer's gross margin increased over 50 percent; wage rates paid in the industry were reduced nearly 20 percent; and net profits steadily increased, the four big companies earning 45 percent more in 1931 than in 1928. Needless to say, the increased prices in the face of reduced consumer buying did not stimulate sales; less tobacco was consumed, supplies were further piled up, and the situation of the tobacco producer was made even more unfavorable.

I am well aware of the charge that since the processing tax authorized by this bill will be passed on, in part, to the consumer, the cost of living will be increased. To some extent this is true. It is also true that all of the tax need not, and should not, be passed on to the consumer. The figures I have quoted above suggest that some of the slack can well be taken up in the long line between producer and consumer.

The bill protects the consumer amply in paragraph 3 of the declaration of policy, wherein it stipulates that it is the policy of Congress:

> To protect the consumers' interest by readjusting farm production at such level as will not increase the percentage of the consumers' retail expenditures for agricultural commodities, or products derived therefrom, which is returned to the farmer, above the percentage which was returned to the farmer in the pre-war period, August 1909 to July 1914.

Under that provision consumers will not pay the farmer a higher percentage of their income than they paid him before the war. As soon as the market price of wheat goes up to the pre-war ratio, the tax is removed. At present there is not much more than a half cent's worth of wheat in a 16-ounce loaf of bread. Triple the price of wheat and you have added only a cent to the cost of that loaf. Double the present price of cotton and the price of a dollar cotton shirt would increase only 2 cents.

Even that increase in the cost of living, slight though it is, can be countenanced only because of the far-heavier contribution the increased farm buying power will make to the city worker, as the demand for the city's products picks up, and because of the social and economic grief awaiting us unless some such measure as this is enacted to revitalize our whole economic structure.

Congress is asked by the terms of this measure to grant the President and the Secretary of Agriculture broad and flexible powers. There is the authority, first of all, to provide for effective yet voluntary reduction in crop acreage planted. No farmer is compelled to reduce his acreage. If, after understanding the necessity for such reduction, and after apprising himself of the terms upon which his land may be taken out of production, the farmer decides to reduce his acreage, he will be entitled to an adjustment benefit. The amount of such benefit will depend upon the rate and proceeds of the processing tax and upon the amount of acreage removed from production.

Secondly, the bill grants authority to provide for reduction in the amount of any commodity produced for market.

Acreage control, quite obviously, is not suited to preventing overproduction of livestock. The only way to meet that situation is to control the number, and possibly the tonnage, of the livestock marketed. Similarly, it may be found that control of the cotton surplus can best be handled through control of production at the gin rather than control of acreage planted.

To carry out a program of either acreage or production control, authority is asked to compensate the producer through rental or benefit payments. The details of those methods of payment must be left to the discretion of those empowered to administer the act. It is pertinent to observe here that the bill contains revenue features adequate to prevent any loss to the Treasury by reason of such control operations. Perhaps, in view of our experiences of the past 4 years, that observation should be set aside for special and grateful emphasis.

The bill confers authority, in the third place, permitting the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into agreements with processors, associations of producers, and others engaged in the handling of agricultural commodities. In many instances such agreements may assure producers a fair return without the necessity for employing the processing tax and rental or benefit payments. It has been suggested, for example, that the control of hog production can be met in large part through such agreements. This view has been advanced, I may say, by men well qualified to speak for both the producing and the processing segments of the industry.

Such agreements might also be instrumental in assuring the tobacco producer a better price for his commodity. In general, it is quite likely that by means of marketing agreements processors may find it possible to eliminate some of those costs of distribution and those distributive practices which now serve to depress the price to the producer without, at the same time, granting commensurate reductions to the consumer. The marketing agreements also may afford a means of providing relief for many minor commodities not specifically included in the bill as subject to the acreage or production-control provisions.

Fourth, authority is asked to license processors, associations of producers, or other persons, if this becomes necessary in order to eliminate unfair practices or changes that tend to prevent the effectual operation of the other features of the bill. On the probable use of this authority permit me to quote from the testimony of the Secretary of Agriculture before the Senate Committee on Agriculure.

> As to the licensing provisions, I regard them as vital. They are not an end in themselves, but are supplementary authority to effectuate production and marketing programs that might otherwise be defeated through practices unfair to the public or producers, or even to the large number of processors and distributors who would be making an earnest attempt to effectuate the policy of the bill. To illustrate: I would feel that the policy of the bill were being defeated should, as a result of a 3-cent processing tax on cotton, an excessive increase in price be passed on the consumer. The cotton farmer obtains approximately 5 cents for the cotton in a shirt which costs the consumer a dollar or a dollar and a half. A 3-cent tax, even with due allowance for wastage and other factors, should not increase that cost more than approximately another 5 cents. Should, as a result of the operation of the bill, there develop practices or charges unfair to the producer or consumer, I would feel that the licensing provisions might be called into play. Without attempting to speculate as to the existence in fact of the many unfair practices frequently alleged to exist in our distributive system, it seems necessary that there should be authority to restrict such practices when they are shown in fact to exist and when they tend to defeat the other operations under the bill.

Finally, the bill asks that authority be given to deal with the cotton situation for the current year through the cotton-option contracts provided in the Smith cotton bill, which received the consideration of the Senate at the last session. I take it that it is not necessary to review the features of that proposal, which by now are well known.

These are, to be sure, broad powers. They are requested on the ground that a national economic emergency exists, requiring the restoration of agricultural purchasing power, and that in no other way suggested can that end be achieved. Both premise and conclusion, in my humble judgment, are inescapable. There may be those who viewed the banking crisis of recent memory as an emergency, but who failed to account the situation in agriculture and industry as an emergency. That would be a superficial attitude. Let us not be lulled into a false sense of security by reason of the fact that food and fiber still pour into our city markets. The distress back on the farm and its effects on urban employment and business generally constitute a basic emergency in our civilization. A closed bank, being obvious, is an emergency; a bankrupt agriculture, though of necessity still producing, is quite as grave and as fundamental an emergency. In 1931 that great jurist, Mr. Justice Brandeis, said that "the people of the United States are confronted with an emergency more serious than war." If that was true then, how much more is it true today?

The powers it is proposed to grant in this bill are, then, broad, and conceivable only in times of emergency and in the hands of an administration which has the full confidence of the people. It is well for us to have a clear notion of the attitude of those who will administer the bill. Let me again quote Secretary Wallace, from his testimony before the Senate Committee on Agriculture, with reference to the processing tax. He said:

> The processing tax will not necessarily become operative with respect to all commodities brought under the protection of the bill. If a satisfactory price could be reached and maintained by trade agreements, no tax would be imposed. Circumstances must decide the necessity for the tax with respect to any particular commodity, and the facts will determine the amount of the tax.
> When rental or benefit payments are found necessary to correct the situation the tax must produce the revenue necessary to administer the bill and to protect the Treasury from deficits. The tax is permitted to be levied, however, only with due regard for the consumer's ability to meet any increase in price occasioned thereby.

And in a public address over the radio on the evening of April 1 Secretary Wallace further outlined his views as follows:

> For the benefit of producers and processors alike, I would like to give my views as to the philosophy of this farm bill. As I see it, the broad centralizing power of the Government is delegated to the President, and through him to the Secretary of Agriculture, to enable producers and processors to work together in bringing order out of the present chaos. Producers and processors are given the opportunity to work together to make such adjustments in production and prices as are fair to the producer, which are possible for attainment for the processors' point of view without harming any legitimate interest of the processor, and which maintain the consumers' just interest as measured by the 5-year pre-war period.
> When the bill becomes law, I hope it will not be necessary for the Secretary of Agriculture to act as a policeman. It may be necessary for him to act as a referee, but the normal situation, as I see it, is one in which the producers and processors, working together, are able to draw on each other's knowledge and experience, and with the help of the centralizing power of the Government put that knowledge and experience to work in such a way as to adjust production to consumption intelligently and practically. For many years there has been a wall between the processors and the farmers in this country. The processors have had information about changes in consumers' demands and probable future prices which they have not passed on, in any effective way, to the farmer. The farmers, therefore, have all too often worked in the dark and have not modified the quantity or quality of their production so as to fill their markets to the best advantage.
> In Denmark they do things differently. The producer is in direct touch with the ultimate consumer, and modifies his methods conscientiously and promptly to meet the changes in the consumer demands. Denmark is a small country. The methods which work there do not apply here, but the principle is the same, and it is exceedingly important, in my opinion, that the Government of the United States and the processors cooperate with the farmer in enabling him to meet, with the least damage possible, the shifts in his production which a rapidly changing world requires.
> If the farmers and processors interested in the various commodities which would be handled under the act will approach each other and the Government in the right, cooperative spirit, I am sure that we can raise prices very materially during the next year. As a practical man I can realize that we may not be able to bring prices of farm products up to cost of production or to pre-war parity in the next year. We may have to go step by step as long as there are so many unemployed—but as we increase prices of farm products the demand for city goods by farmers will reduce the unemployment. Therefore, if we handle this problem sympathetically, yet firmly, we may push forward into the prosperity which rightfully belongs to a nation which is fully equipped with marvelous factories, intelligent workingmen, fertile farms, and willing farmers. The thing can be done if only we have the unselfishness, the patience, and the courage to do it.

In order that we may foresee the probable results of this bill, let me suggest the actual procedure likely to be followed, once the bill becomes law.

As the Secretary of Agriculture has announced, the method of acreage or production control to be selected for each commodity—within the powers granted by the bill—the rate of tax levied, and the subsequent detailed regulations, will be determined only after consulting the experience and judgment of all sectors of the industry concerned. I imagine that one of the first moves when the bill becomes law would be to call in spokesmen of the farmers, the wholesale and retail dealers, the processors and jobbers, and to ask them for their best judgment on the methods to be employed in the administration of the law. Thus conclusions would have to be reached on points such as these:

First. If a tax is imposed on the processing of cotton—to use a specific example—at what rate should it be imposed?

Second. At what date should the tax be made effective?

Third. What amount of reduction in acreage or production should be set as the goal?

Fourth. What method should be followed in arranging with farmers in order to bring about reduction?

Once the recommendations are all in, tentative conclusions may be drawn, placed before the several spokesmen for judgment, and developed, finally, into the methods and regulations to be employed.

Once the rate of the tax, if any is necessary, is determined and the probable proceeds from that tax estimated, it will be possible to estimate the amount of the funds available for distribution to farmers who agree to reduce acreage or production. The actual administration of the program out in the field, I am convinced, can largely be handled by a combination of farmers' emergency adjustment associations, with the existing Federal, State, and county agricultural extension services. The agricultural extension machinery, supplemented by the machinery of the State colleges and experiment stations, can be of vast help in getting the program under way, providing the necessary educational assistance, and suiting the program to local needs.

The highly prejudiced rumors that an army of employees and agents would be required specially to administer this act certainly do not spring from any contact with the purposes and plans of the Secretary of Agriculture as explained to me. To the fullest extent possible farmers themselves will be asked to take the responsibility for administering their end of the program.

I have said that the parity provision is the heart of the bill. If that be granted, let me located close to the heart the provisions for flexibility. In one respect flexibility is inherent in the concept of parity. In another sense the flexibility permitted by the measure is the realist's answer to the problems of agriculture, to the diversity of agriculture, and to the constantly changing panorama which we call our economic system.

The flexibility inherent in the effort to attain parity of farm and industrial prices protects both farmer and city man. The processing tax, for instance, disappears automatically when farm-product prices reach parity. That is flexibility within rather well-established limits—the upper limit and the goal—being that national prosperity which will result from the proper balance between the major producing groups of the Nation.

If it were the design of the sponsors of this legislation to be arbitrary or to favor one group at the expense of another, they would omit from the bill altogether any reference to a base period or level of purchasing power. The economic unwisdom of such a proposal, it should hardly be necessary to say, would alone condemn it. But, aside from that, it is obvious to every lawyer that a statute so worded would confer on the executive arm of the Government so wide and uncontrolled a discretion as to amount to an unlawful delegation of legislative power; for it would confer upon the Secretary of Agriculture the authority to fix taxes without reference to any legislative rule, norm, or standard set by the Congress. That defect the present bill adequately avoids.

There is another element of flexibility which has to do with how rapidly the maximum amount of tax would be attained. From the language of the bill, however, even without reference to the expressed intent of the Secretary of Agriculture, one can hardly conjure up any unusual or alarming delegation of powers. If the imposition of a given rate of tax would result in such a reduction in consumption as to defeat the purposes of the act, it is plainly the duty of the Secretary to lower the rate of tax. Thus paragraph 2 of the declaration of policy asserts it to be the policy of Congress "to approach such equality of purchasing power by gradual correction of the present inequalities therein at as rapid a rate as is deemed feasible in view of the current consumptive demand in domestic and foreign markets."

Considering the broad sweep of economic forces through the years, and the relatively rapid shifts in production and consumption from decade to decade, the flexibility incorporated in a measure such as this becomes deeply significant. No one can safely predict, for instance, that our problem will always be one of reducing agricultural output. Indeed, within the space of the past generation men have expressed their concern about pressure of population upon the food supply. The World War, to be sure, sharpened that concern. Yet who can predict with any certainty the full economic effect 10 years hence of the trade restrictions now enforced against our exports, or the effect of the back-to-the-land movement now in progress, or the complex social and economic problems inevitably to be created by such a movement? Will it be a surplus problem 10 years hence? We can make logical, well-founded surmises, but they remain only surmises. It may very well be, Mr. President, that some such machinery as is provided by this bill—and notably its essential flexibility—may have to be employed at some future date, in order to feed the American people, to stimulate production and to preserve and perpetuate, for reasons opposite to those influencing us today, the very parity, the level of purchasing power, we aim at today.

For legal judgment on this large matter of flexibility, and of delegation of authority, we may turn to the opinion of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Hampton & Co. v. The United States (276 U.S. 394). In that opinion, handed down in 1927, it will be recalled, we find this carefully considered conclusion:

> The field of Congress involves all and many varieties of legislative action, and Congress has found it frequently necessary to use officers of the executive branch, within defined limits, to secure the exact effect intended by its acts of legislation, by vesting discretion in such officers to make public regulations interpreting a statute and directing the details of its execution, even to the extent of providing for penalizing a breach of such regulations. (United States v. Grimand, 220 U.S. 506, 518; Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U.S. 364; Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U.S. 470; In re Kollock, 165 U.S. 526; Oceanic Navigation Co. v. Stranahan, 214 U.S. 320.)
> Congress may feel itself unable conveniently to determine exactly when its exercise of the legislative power should become effective, because dependent on future conditions, and it may leave the determination of such time to the decision of an executive, or, as often happens in matters of State legislation, it may be left to a popular vote of the residents of a district to be affected by the legislation. While in a sense one may say that such residents are exercising legislative power, it is not an exact statement, because the power has already been exercised legislatively by the body vested with that power under the Constitution, the condition of its legislation going into effect being made dependent by the legislature on the expression of the voters of a certain district. As Judge Ranney, of the Ohio Supreme Court, in Cincinnati, Wilmington & Zanesville Railroad Co. v. Commissioners (1 Ohio St. 77, 88), said in such a case:
> "The true distinction, therefore, is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring an authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law. The first cannot be done; to the latter no valid objection can be made." (See also Moers v. Reading, 21 Penn. St. 188, 202; Locke's Appeal, 72 Penn. St. 491, 498.)
> Again, one of the great functions conferred on Congress by the Federal Constitution is the regulation of interstate commerce and rates to be exacted by interstate carriers for the passenger and merchandise traffic. The rates to be fixed are myriad. If Congress were to be required to fix every rate, it would be impossible to exercise the power at all. Therefore, common sense requires that in the fixing of such rates Congress may provide a commission, as it does, called the Interstate Commerce Commission, to fix those rates, after hearing evidence and argument concerning them from interested parties, all in accord with a general rule that Congress first lays down, that rates shall be just and reasonable considering the service given, and not discriminatory. As said by this Court in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Goodrich Transit Co. (224 U.S. 194, 214), "The Congress may not delegate its purely legislative power to a commission; but, having laid down the general rules of action under which a commission shall proceed, it may require of that commission the application of such rules to particular situations and the investigation of facts, with a view to making orders in a particular matter within the rules laid down by the Congress."

The principle upon which such a power is upheld in State legislation as to fixing railway rates is admirably stated by Judge Mitchell, in the case of State v. Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. (38 Minn. 281, 298 to 302). The learned judge says on page 301:

"If such a power is to be exercised at all, it can only be satisfactorily done by a board or commission, constantly in session, whose time is exclusively given to the subject, and who, after investigation of the facts, can fix rates with reference to the peculiar circumstances of each road and each particular kind of business, and who can change or modify these rates to suit the ever-varying conditions of traffic. Our legislature has gone a step farther than most others and vested our commission with full power to determine what rates are equal and reasonable in each particular case. Whether this was wise or not is not for us to say, but in doing so we cannot see that they have transcended their constitutional authority. They have not delegated to the commission any authority or discretion as to what the law shall be—which would not be allowable—but have merely conferred upon it an authority and discretion, to be exercised in the execution of the law, and under and in pursuance of it, which is entirely permissible. The legislature itself has passed upon the expediency of the law, and what it shall be. The commission is intrusted with no authority or discretion upon these questions." (See also the language of Justices Miller and Bradley in the same case in this Court, 134 U.S. 418, 459, 461, 464.)

It is conceded by counsel that Congress may use executive officers in the application and enforcement of a policy declared in law by Congress, and authorize such officers in the application of the congressional declaration to enforce it by regulation equivalent to law. But it is said that this never has been permitted to be done where Congress has exercised the power to levy taxes and fix customs duties. The authorities make no such distinction. The same principle that permits Congress to exercise its rate-making power in interstate commerce, by declaring the rule which shall prevail in the legislative fixing of rates, and enables it to remit to a rate-making body created in accordance with its provisions the fixing of such rates, justifies a similar provision for the fixing of customs duties on imported merchandise.

If Congress shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to fix such rates is directed to conform, such legislative action is not a forbidden delegation of legislative power. If it is thought wise to vary the customs duties according to changing conditions of production at home and abroad, it may authorize the Chief Executive to carry out this purpose, with the advisory assistance of a tariff commission appointed under congressional authority.

Mr. President, the bill before the Senate now recognizes that no one measure, no one method, can suffice to solve the problems of agriculture. The bill clearly understands that various methods are necessary at various times and under various conditions. What may look well on paper may not work out in practice. If that is so, the method must be changed. A method of acreage reduction applicable to wheat cannot, of course, be applied to hogs. An administrator aware of these practical problems, aided by the experience of men intimately familiar with every phase of the industries involved, will provide us with high hopes for a large measure of success in this endeavor.

As practical men, cannot we agree on the imperative necessity for such flexibility as the bill permits? The production and marketing conditions for the various basic agricultural commodities vary from one to another. The continuous change in economic situations makes any inflexible solution certain to be found unsuitable or ineffective after a comparatively short time. To deal with the many factors that contribute to the farmers' present situation, and to deal with those factors as they vary in application to the commodities concerned, and to meet changes in the economic situation, it plainly devolves upon Congress to enact legislation granting broad and flexible powers to the administration.

Nor do we need to grant such powers, under present circumstances, with the slightest trepidation; for I doubt if there has ever been a time in the history of the Nation when the people were more unitedly, more whole-heartedly back of the administration and of the Congress than at this very moment. Their cooperation in the furtherance of this and other measures seems assured.

Mr. President, I urge the prompt disposal and passage of this measure. The time for compiling more mountains of statistics for further painful and exhaustive researches is past. We face a painfully practical situation, and only so practical and so realistic a measure as the one before the Senate will suffice.

It is, as the President has said, an untrod path. Do you prefer the alternative of inaction, the tragedy that must deepen with any such negative program?

This is an untrod path, but it is a realistic path that seems to lead onward and upward. To follow it will require patience, and resourcefulness, and courage. I believe that the men who will be responsible for administering this measure, for guiding us along that path, have those qualities in abundant measure.

One need not speak of the obvious necessity for prompt action. By every consideration, Mr. President, the time for action is here. The hour has struck.

Other features of the bill are reserved for future discussion.

I thank the Senate for the very patient hearing it has given me.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, conscious as we all are, I am sure, of the value of the contribution of the able Senator from Arkansas, the acknowledged leader of the majority, and especially the information and explanation which he has communicated by his splendid address, nevertheless I assume that Senators not busy in their offices necessarily will be pleased to remain in the Chamber for the remainder of the discussion, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	King	Robinson, Ark.
Ashurst	Couzens	La Follette	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Cutting	Lewis	Russell
Bachman	Dickinson	Logan	Schall
Bailey	Dieterich	Lonergan	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dill	Long	Shipstead
Barkley	Duffy	McAdoo	Smith
Black	Erickson	McCarran	Steiwer
Bone	Fess	McGill	Stephens
Borah	Fletcher	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Frazier	McNary	Thomas, Utah
Brown	George	Metcalf	Townsend
Bulkley	Glass	Murphy	Trammell
Bulow	Gore	Neely	Tydings
Byrd	Hale	Norbeck	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Harrison	Norris	Van Nuys
Capper	Hatfield	Nye	Wagner
Caraway	Hayden	Overton	Walcott
Carey	Hebert	Patterson	Walsh
Clark	Johnson	Pittman	Wheeler
Connally	Kean	Pope	White
Coolidge	Kendrick	Reed
Copeland	Keyes	Reynolds

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Ninety Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, let us proceed now with the committee amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next committee amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The committee proposes, on page 3, line 13, after the word "upon", to insert the words "not in excess of the market price."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, what happened to the amendment on page 2, line 16?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. I did not understand that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think there was some confusion about it, and in order to avoid any misunderstanding, I ask unanimous consent that we return to the amendment on page 2, so that I may offer an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. McKELLAR. On page 2, ending line 21.

Mr. SMITH. The tobacco amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Tennessee to ask unanimous consent that the vote by which that amendment was agreed to be reconsidered?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wish the Senator would allow that amendment to go over until tomorrow, because I am expecting some figures from the Department which will shed some light on the matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator just what figures the department has given me, and I should like to offer an amendment to the amendment, and am willing to have it go over. I want to have the vote reconsidered now.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not want to have to object now.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator objects, I will move that we return to the amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask that the Senator allow it to go over until tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw his request?

Mr. McKELLAR. Temporarily, Mr. President. I want to say to the Senator and to the Senate that I propose to have a vote on the amendment which I intend to offer, and it is very surprising that there is any objection to it at all. We cannot get along in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor. He withdraws his amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. With the intention of offering the amendment later.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Kentucky will not object to a reconsideration of the vote by which this amendment was agreed to, because it was very clear to me, at least I thought it was, that we had not yet taken final action. I call attention to the necessity of making some provision for a different base period in connection with milk. I hope the Senator will let the reconsideration be noted, and then tomorrow, or at any time suitable to him, we can consider these various amendments, or he might be willing that I might at this time present what I have to say about milk.

Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. What connection will that have with the tobacco amendment?

Mr. COPELAND. It has no connection with tobacco; but what I would offer regarding milk would have to come in the language provided in the committee amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no objection to the reconsideration of this amendment, provided it is not going to be acted on today.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, under those circumstances I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment on page 2 was agreed to this afternoon be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? Without objection, the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer the following amendment, in line 21, page 2, after the numerals "1928", to insert a colon instead of the period and the following language: "Provided, That in the case of dark-fired tobacco the base period shall be from August 1909 to August 1914." I should like to have that pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the amendment to the amendment be temporarily passed over.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I want to propound an inquiry.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. The general base period is from 1909 to 1914?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is.

Mr. McNARY. On motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] the period was changed so as to include the period from 1919 to 1928. Now, I understand the Senator from Tennessee to desire to go back to the original base period.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; only as to one class of tobacco—the class known as "dark-fired tobacco." That is a class of tobacco that is well known, and it is an exception to the general rule. I have no objection whatsoever to the date fixed for the other kinds of tobacco taking the period from 1919 to 1928. Only as to dark-fired tobacco do I want the base period of 1909 to 1914 restored.

Mr. McNARY. Is that because during that period a higher price was paid?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is because the Department's figures show that during the period from 1909 to 1914 the price was seven-tenths of 1 cent higher, and I think that in order to equalize such prices the amendment to the amendment ought to be agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Yes; but let me state to the Senator from Tennessee that a base period is not based upon the maximum price of any particular commodity. It is based on its relationship to other commodities.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that, but there is a difference between the standard price of dark-fired tobacco and of other kinds of tobacco, so that if the period between 1919 and 1928 were established for all tobacco, it would mean a discrimination against the peculiar kind of tobacco known as "dark-fired tobacco", and that is why I am offering this amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Of course, we are not up to the question of discussing it now. When that time comes I shall be further heard.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, as I understand the matter, the vote by which the amendment on page 2 was agreed to has been reconsidered, and that amendment is now the pending amendment. Am I right in that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Tennessee has offered an amendment to the amendment. I wish to offer one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator would not be in order until after the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee had been acted upon. The Senator from Tennessee has offered an amendment to a committee amendment. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to the committee amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not understand that to be the parliamentary situation at all. The Senator from Tennessee has proposed an amendment which he hopes to call up on another day, in order to conform to the convenience of the Senator from Kentucky, and not to have it acted on at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No agreement has yet been entered into that the amendment to the amendment should be passed over.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee is here, and can speak for himself. I understood that he wished unanimous consent that his amendment might go over until tomorrow. Am I right in that?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Kentucky asked that that be done. I would be perfectly willing to have it passed on this afternoon, but both the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Oregon asked that it go over.

Mr. McNARY. No, Mr. President; I did not ask that it go over. I was echoing the statement of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Kentucky wants it to go over, and I ask that it may go over.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the parliamentary situation is that the vote by which the committee amendment on page 2 was agreed to has been reconsidered. An amendment to the amendment has now been offered by the Senator from Tennessee, and that has been passed over until tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There has been no request of the Senator to pass it over.

Mr. BARKLEY. In order that that defect may be cured, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee may go over until tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I move to amend the committee amendment by adding, on line 18, page 2, after the word "tobacco", the words "and milk"; and at the end of line 21 a semicolon and the language "in the case of milk the base period shall be 1919 to 1923, inclusive."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator offer that to have it pending when we take up the amendment tomorrow?

Mr. COPELAND. No; I should be glad to discuss the matter now and have it settled at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The parliamentary situation is this: An amendment has been proposed by the Senator from Tennessee to the committee amendment the Senator is now proposing to amend, and unanimous consent has been given that it shall go over until tomorrow, so it is not open to amendment at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me for a moment in that regard?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. So that the Senate may see the exact situation as I have it before me, I ask at this point that a telegram from Martin J. Condon, of Memphis, Tenn., on this subject be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMPHIS, TENN., April 3, 1933.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate:

Referring House bill 3835, farm aid applying to tobacco, the period 1909 to 1914 for tobacco should be retained in the bill, so far as Kentucky, Tennessee fire-cured tobacco types 22 and 23, known as "dark-fired tobacco" are concerned, as the prices prevailing during that period truly and correctly represent the average prices under normal conditions for such tobacco. The amendment offered by Senator BARKLEY changing period to 1919 to 1928 is extremely unfair and unjust for dark-fired tobacco. Please do all you can to have period 1909 to 1914 restored and retained for dark-fired tobacco. We do not understand section 16 of this bill re floor stocks, but this tax should not apply to processed articles sold and delivered, and we strongly urge your support of the foregoing recommendations. Writing you today.

MARTIN J. CONDON.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee, since the matter is going to be left open, that I should be glad if he will be good enough to withdraw his amendment today and let me offer mine and dispose of it. I assume the Senator is anxious to get rid of the bill as soon as possible.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, it seems to me that there would not be any time lost if we might discuss the amendment of the Senator from New York now and let the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee be pending tomorrow. I have no objection to having a vote now directly on the amendment of the Senator from New York. The vote as to the tobacco amendment will come up on the same amendment of the committee tomorrow.

Mr. McKELLAR. That will be entirely satisfactory to me. I have no objection to taking that course.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Tennessee, then, withdraws his amendment for today?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair state the parliamentary situation. By unanimous consent the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee has gone over until tomorrow and may not be taken up now except by unanimous consent.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask unanimous consent that I may offer an amendment now. I am doing this to hasten the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the request was that the amendment go over which applied only to tobacco and which was offered by the Senator from Tennessee. It did not include any other amendment affecting any other product. Inasmuch as that amendment has gone over until tomorrow, it would be within the parliamentary rules to take up other amendments now and consider them. The committee amendment did not go over until tomorrow, but only the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to the committee amendment.

Mr. SMITH. As I understand the situation, the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted was reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. SMITH. An amendment has been offered to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is true.

Mr. SMITH. Then unanimous consent was granted that that committee amendment, having been reconsidered, plus the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, would go over until tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. BARKLEY. Inasmuch as I submitted the unanimous-consent request, I wish to say that it was intended to apply only to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to the committee amendment. I did not request that the entire committee amendment go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If that is the understanding of the Senate, the Chair has no objection. Is there objection to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee going over until tomorrow? However, the Chair does not understand the parliamentary situation to be such that another amendment would then be in order to the committee amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee going over until tomorrow, we cannot consider the amendment of the Senator from New York until the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee has been either accepted or rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore.. That is the ruling of the Chair under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SMITH. Very good. Therefore, if the amendment of the Senator from New York is now offered, we are considering the amendment that we have agreed shall go over until tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from New York is not in order until the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee has been disposed of.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we may start all over again. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the former unanimous-consent agreement be abandoned and that the committee amendment on page 2 be held under consideration by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. I think I understand the ruling of the Chair, and if I do I beg to express, with some trepidation, a little dissent. As I understand the situation the amendment which was submitted by the committee was accepted and then by unanimous consent the vote by which it was accepted was reconsidered. The Senator from Tennessee then offered an amendment which did not apply to the entire amendment offered by the Senate committee but merely applied to one commodity within an aggregate of commodities, to wit, tobacco. It would seem to me, therefore, that the postponement of the consideration until tomorrow of the particular amendment which the Senator from Tennessee offered to the entire committee amendment would not preclude the consideration of other amendments that might be tendered to the language of the entire committee amendment which did not affect the question involved in the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds that the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee is the pending amendment, whether it be disposed of now or later, and that under the parliamentary rules while one amendment is pending to an amendment no other amendment is in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I want to make an appeal to the Senator from South Carolina to withdraw his objection to the unanimous consent which I submitted. In other words, all I am seeking to obtain is a way out of the existing parliamentary tangle. If the Senator from South Carolina will permit the matter to be taken up de novo the situation will be this: The committee amendment will be stated. It will then be possible for the Senator from New York to offer his amendment, and at the time that is disposed of, if it be this afternoon, the Senator from Tennessee may offer his amendment, and then by unanimous consent it may go over until the next session of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am willing to proceed in any way that will meet the approval of the Senate. All I want is a vote on my amendment, and if it will help the situation in any way, I shall be glad to withdraw it after getting unanimous consent to come back to it tomorrow, when tomorrow comes, and that I be given an opportunity to offer my amendment again.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. All the Senator from Tennessee has to do to protect his rights is to prevent the committee amendment from being finally acted upon until he has offered his amendment. I understand the Senator from Tennessee withdraws his amendment now?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; with the understanding that I may offer it later.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment with the understanding that he may present it later. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none. Without objection, the agreement is entered into.

Mr. SMITH. Therefore the committee amendment is now pending and is open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I renew the offer of my amendment. On page 2, line 18, after the word "tobacco", I move that there shall be added the words "and milk"; and at the end of line 21, strike out the period, insert a semicolon and the words "in the case of milk the base period shall be 1919 to 1923, inclusive."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this is a very important matter. The question of the base period has been gone into very carefully. There may be very good reasons for changing the base period with respect to milk; but I want to remind the Senator from New York that whenever we speak of a base period it must be a period to give the farmer a fair relationship between the things he sells and his buying power as related to industrial commodities or the things he buys. I would like to have the Senator clear that up by stating whether it is based upon the idea that a higher price was received by milk producers at that time or whether in fairness in its relation to the articles he buys.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I shall be happy to attempt an explanation. In all frankness, I have selected the years 1919 to 1923, inclusive, because they are the years when the farmer was receiving the best price he has ever had for milk during the past 25 years. I would have been glad to take the years made effective for tobacco except for the fact that if I did that it would mean a loss to the farmer of four tenths of a cent per quart of milk.

In the years 1909 to 1914, those years which are used in the bill as the base period, the farmers were receiving the lowest prices for milk that they have received in the last 25 years, except the present time and last year. During that time the average price for milk was $1.79 per hundred pounds. That is about 3½ cents a quart. That was the rate which was received during the base period accepted by the bill.

Right after the war the dairy farmers became organized. In my section of the country they organized the Dairymen's League, which had as many as 75,000 or 80,000 members, representing the farmers of New York, Pennsylvania, western Massachusetts, Vermont, and, I think, even a part of Ohio. As the result of cooperative effort on their part the prices of milk increased. The maximum price for milk was obtained in 1919. At that time milk was brought up to the point where it brought $3.13 per hundredweight. But there has been a steady decline ever since, so that last year the price received by the farmer was only $1.31. Senators, I appeal to you that it is a deadly thing to attempt to operate a dairy farm and have milk bring as low as 2½ cents a quart, which is all the farmers receive.

If we were to take the general base period provided by the bill, which is the pre-war period from 1909 to 1914, the farmer would then receive $1.79 per hundred pounds for his milk, which, as I pointed out, is the lowest price in the last quarter of a century until the past year. I have undertaken by the amendment which I have offered to give the milk farmer exactly the same sort of protection that is sought to be provided for the wheat farmer, the cotton farmer, and the others who are to benefit by the bill. I think in all fairness to the great dairy interests of the country—not alone my own State of New York but the States of Wisconsin, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and all the States on the eastern seaboard—the amendment should be adopted. I submit the amendment for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCARRAN in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator give me his judgment as to whether the basis he now suggests would be lower than the cost-of-production basis carried in part III of the bill, page 25? This is the final option granted the Secretary of Agriculture to establish a cost-of-production price. I want to know whether that, in the Senator's judgment, would be as high as the base price which he is now discussing?

Mr. COPELAND. If the base price were founded on the years 1909 to 1914, the milk farmer would not be helped a particle.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, is it the Senator's understanding of the bill that the purpose is to restore the price of commodity farm products to the basis of the period 1909 to 1914?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If that is the purpose of the bill I am absolutely in error as to its meaning. My conception of the bill is that its purpose is to restore the parity in the purchasing power of agricultural products as compared with industrial products which prevailed during that period.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator is right about that. I think, perhaps, I spoke hastily, and I agree to what he has said.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield the floor.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish to say, Mr. President, that the dairymen's representatives came before the Agricultural Committee and stated that they wanted to have this bill passed in substantially the same form in which it came from the House. As it came from the House my recollection is that it contained this provision.

We ought to take into consideration, it seems to me, the fact that the dairymen are the best-organized group of farmers in the United States. They themselves are better able to raise the price of their commodities in normal times than is any other group of agriculturists in the United States of America. If they have a parity price, and the price of other commodities goes up, it does not mean that they are going back to the pre-war basis about which the Senator from New York speaks, but they will be given a price for their milk which will assure them the same purchasing power that other commodities have throughout the United States. Consequently if this bill shall pass it will not mean that they will go back to the price of 2½ cents, as the Senator from New York intimated they would, but there will be taken into consideration the purchasing power of milk and the purchasing power of other commodities in the United States at the time the bill goes into effect. So it will not be necessary for them to go back to the post-war price. If we are going to have the change made with reference to milk, then we ought to change the whole bill and make the same alteration with reference to cotton, wheat, and everything else. The only reason, I take it, the same basic period is not prescribed with reference to tobacco is that there are some unusual and peculiar circumstances which relate to tobacco, and the tobacco growers know more about that than I do.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Do I understand that the representatives of the dairymen came before the committee and wanted to keep this provision in the bill?

Mr. WHEELER. That is exactly the statement which was made. They came before the committee and represented that the dairymen's organization asked that the bill be passed substantially and practically in the form in which it was written as it came from the House. I think the chairman of the committee will agree with me about that.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I desire to make a statement. I have been called to confer on another matter, and it is imperative that I should attend that conference. Therefore, I should like to have the Senate to take a recess at this time until tomorrow, if that meets with the approval of the leader of the majority.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina has the floor.

Mr. SMITH. I merely wanted to state the case so that the Senate may take action in reference thereto. I yield the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is my purpose, in compliance with the request of the Senator from South Carolina and other Senators who find it necessary to meet an important engagement respecting the business of the Senate, to move a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I had hoped, and I still entertain the hope, that we might recess until Monday. The Republican Members of this body, the minority, have been meeting for 3 consecutive days in conference, lasting from 10:30 until 12 o'clock, so as to study various pending measures.

The mail of Senators is unusually heavy. Senators on both sides advise me that they have unanswered mail, as I have, running back for several days. The hearings on the pending bill have just been finished. It is a complicated measure. We are all anxious to proceed with it, and I am particularly so. I have never asked for delay on any measure; but I hope that the Senate may take a recess until Monday, and I appeal to the Senator from Arkansas to consent that may be done.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I should very much like to comply with the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon, and I think he knows that is true; but the situation is this: There is a necessity for reasonably prompt action on the pending bill, as the Senator fully understands. Of course no Senator has displayed any intention of unduly delaying the bill, but my thought is that we should proceed with the bill to a conclusion as promptly as may be, and following the disposition of this bill arrange to take a recess for a sufficient length of time to enable Senators to clear up matters in their offices.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. I ask the Senator if it is expected that the bill will be passed tomorrow?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is not expected that the bill will be passed tomorrow.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, my request was in the interest of expediting the bill. I am sure there is not a Senator on this side of the Chamber who does not desire to dispose of this measure as quickly as is consistent with its thorough consideration.

I think, Mr. President, I will say to the able Senator from Arkansas, that expedition will be promoted and time will be conserved if we may have an opportunity to study the pending bill over the week-end.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I recognize the splendid cooperation the Senator from Oregon and his associates have given in connection with the bills considered by the Senate, and I am disposed, although with some reluctance, to yield to his request, so I will move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Before the motion is put let me say, Mr. President, that I feel assured that this action—I am so assured by many Senators who have been about me since the Senator from Oregon made his suggestion—will not tend to delay final action on the bill, but may result in facilitating its disposition, and I want to respond to any reasonable request the Senator from Oregon is prompted to make.

5-DAY WEEK AND 6-HOUR DAY—MOTION TO RECONSIDER

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield for the purpose of enabling me to enter a motion which it is necessary to enter today or tomorrow, for the reconsideration of a bill?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the votes whereby the so-called "Black bill", being Senate bill 158, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Florida will be entered.

PROPOSED TWENTY-FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have here a very interesting address prepared and delivered by Hugh Evander Willis, professor of law at the Indiana University School of Law, Bloomington, Ind., on the subject of the Issue Created by the Proposed Twenty-first Amendment to the United States Constitution. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There have been three periods in the history of the prohibition question in the United States, and we are about to enter upon a fourth period. The first period was the period of no social control of the liquor traffic. The second period was the period of the ascendency of the drys. The third period has been the period of the ascendency of the wets. And the fourth period is the unknown period just ahead of us.

In the first period, no worth-while attempt was made to regulate the liquor traffic. People were allowed to manufacture, sell, and drink intoxicating liquors just as they wanted to. Even the clergy in those days drank, and often to excess.

In the second period, a growing group of people who may be called "the drys" became more and more dissatisfied with the social conditions caused by the manufacture and consumption of alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes, and they began more and more to apply social control to the traffic. At first high-license laws were applied, along with various restrictions as to Sunday closing and the sale to minors. High-license laws did produce some revenue, but they did not decrease the social evils caused by the liquor traffic, and people began to realize that it was cheaper to pay taxes than it was to spend money for intoxicating liquors when they stopped spending their money for intoxicating liquors and used it for other more economical purposes. Then local option was tried, but local option was not much of a success because liquor could be and was shipped in from adjoining districts which were wet, or people could go from dry districts into the adjoining wet districts to obtain liquor. Then a great many States adopted State-wide prohibition.

At the time the eighteenth amendment went into effect two thirds of the States had adopted prohibition by popular vote. About 90 percent of the land area was, at least theoretically, dry. At least 70 percent of the population of the United States nominally lived under a dry regime. However, State prohibition failed for just the same reason that local option had failed. Liquor was shipped into the dry States from adjoining wet States in violation of the State prohibition laws. The dry States then appealed to Congress for help, and Congress passed the Wilson Act and the Webb-Kenyon Act and the Reed amendment so as to make it illegal for the liquor interests in the wet States to ship liquor into the dry States. The laws of Congress were flouted just as much as the laws of the dry States had been. When the brewers and distillers of Missouri, Illinois, and Wisconsin found that they could not ship liquor into the dry States in the original packages, or even in interstate commerce or the United States mails, they then turned rumrunners and bootleggers and ran liquor into Iowa, Kansas, and the other dry States just the same way that the bootleggers today are violating the Volstead Act and the eighteenth amendment. Then the dry States insisted upon national prohibition. In 1914 a prohibition amendment received a majority in the House of Representatives, dominated by the Democrats under southern leadership. The eighteenth amendment was proposed by Congress in December 1917 and was ratified by the thirty-sixth State of the Union on January 16, 1919. Later it was ratified by all the States in the Union, with the exception of Connecticut and Rhode Island.

The adoption of the eighteenth amendment to the United States Constitution marks the high tide of the prohibition movement. Soon after the war was over (1918), there followed the moral letdown which usually follows a great war, and the wets began an aggressive campaign to recover the territory which they had lost to the drys in the preceding campaign. Then occurred the third period in the history of the prohibition question.

They first attacked the constitutionality of the eighteenth amendment and they urged every constitutional objection which it was possible for human ingenuity to think of. They urged that the eighteenth amendment was unconstitutional because it was a new grant of power, because it was legislative in form, because it tended to destroy the States, because it was a violation of the reserve powers in the tenth amendment, because it was not adopted by conventions in the States instead of by State legislators. But the United States Supreme Court, in the National Prohibition cases, the case of Leser v. Garnett, and the case of United States v. Sprague, decided against every one of the contentions of the wets. They said that the tenth amendment was not a limitation on the fifth amendment; that any amendment could be adopted either by conventions or by State legislatures; that it, as well as other amendments already in the United States Constitution could be legislative in form or not, as the people chose; and that, because in the United States sovereignty resides in the people as a whole, an amendment could be a new grant of power, or could take some power from the States and give it to the Federal Government and vice versa. The wets did not get very far in their arguments before the United States Supreme Court, but in their fight they may have won some converts. Even if they did not win converts, they undoubtedly strengthened their own lines.

The defeat before the United States Supreme Court did not discourage the wets. Their next piece of strategy was the making of the charge that the eighteenth amendment was put over by the Puritan States on the present generation when they were away at war. Of course, the obvious answer to this charge was the action which had already been taken by the dry States and in Congress before the war. And this charge, therefore, did not fool very many outside some of the present generation.

The next line of attack of the wets against the eighteenth amendment was that it was a violation of personal liberty. All political scientists and legal philosophers knew the absurdity of this claim. They knew there was no such thing as absolute personal liberty for any human being, unless he is a solitary human being on a desert island. They knew that in a social order, the personal liberty of each individual must yield to the personal liberty of all other individuals. They knew that where anyone's personal liberty interfered with the social interests of the people as a whole, that the personal liberty of that individual must yield to social control for the common good. They knew that in a complex, highly specialized social order, to give one man absolute personal liberty would mean not only the destruction of personal liberty of others, but the destruction of the social order itself. They knew that it was not a question of personal liberty, but a question of how far personal liberty can be allowed to go and where social control must begin. They knew that the eighteenth amendment was no more a violation of personal liberty than any other part of our law, that all law is a delimitation of personal liberty. They knew that no other form of social control had more important social interests for its protection than those of the eighteenth amendment which was enacted for the purpose of protecting the social interests in morals, health, safety, and human progress. The wets' attack on the eighteenth amendment on the ground that it was a violation of personal liberty did not get very far with thinking people, but it did have an appeal for a large class of people in the United States, and that is, those affected with the pioneer spirit. The old pioneer was an extreme individualist. He wanted no social control whatever. He wanted to be free from all government. He wanted to go wherever and do whatever he wanted to do. He wanted no other protection than his own trusty gun, and he wanted no liability for anything he might do to anyone else. Of course, this pioneer philosophy worked fairly well in the pioneer society, but it does not fit in a modern complex civilization, and everyone knows this. Yet, there is enough of that pioneer feeling in a great many people so that the wets' appeal to it won a great many converts for the wet cause. Of course, it should have had no appeal except to those who now favor no social control, yet most of the "personal-liberty" men probably favor some plan of social control.

However, even with this success, the wets were not making very much progress, and then they thought of a new line of attack, and that was the failure of the eighteenth amendment. They claimed that the situation was worse under the eighteenth amendment than it had been prior to the eighteenth amendment. Of course, people did not stop to ask them whether or not they wanted the situation better and therefore they were initially able to get away with their claim. They claimed that there was more drinking and more drunkenness; that there was more crime caused by drinking; that there was more vice caused by drinking; that there was more disrespect for law caused by the violation of the eighteenth amendment; and that there was more rumrunning and bootlegging than there had been before the eighteenth amendment was adopted. The correct answer to all these charges of the wets is that they were all lies, and probably no one knew it any better than the wets themselves. It has been estimated by the Attorney General of the United States that there has been a decrease of 70 percent in the consumption of alcoholic liquors in the United States since the adoption of the eighteenth amendment. Sociologists have made a scientific investigation of the matter and have found that any increase in crime in the last dozen years has been due not to the prohibition amendment nor to drink, but to the automobile and the gun. The Wickersham Commission's report, by a majority of 9 to 2, is authority against the wets on all of their charges. Newspapers which now are repeating the charges of the wets—perhaps because they are anxious to get the liquor advertising which they know would be available if the eighteenth amendment was repealed—can be convicted of their own insincerity from their own pages:

"SALOONS OPEN ALL NIGHT, IN VIOLATION OF LAW

"In the section known as 'Little Hell', a network of dives, grimy hotels, lying between LaSalle Avenue and the river on the north side, is another center of evil. Here officers supposed to patrol beats are found drinking openly with white-aproned bartenders after closing hours. On the south side orgies go on until 4 and 5 o'clock in the morning, and policemen are seen in the saloons." (Chicago Tribune, Jan. 30, 1907.)

"YOUNG PEOPLE, DANCE HALLS, AND LIQUOR

"The public dance halls are the shame of Chicago. These halls have proved the first step for the highwayman, the woman of the 'red light' district, and vicious characters in general. It is here that many young girls go whirling down the road to ruin in two-step time." (Chicago Tribune, Feb. 14, 1907.)

"SALOON THE CENTER OF LAWLESSNESS

"Another plague spot is the thirty-eighth police precinct, which is bounded by Division Street on the north, the river on the west and south, and the lake on the east. In the first 51 days of 1906, 872 arrests were made there, and 10 percent of this total were of serious offenders charged with crimes exceeding misdemeanors. In this precinct there were then 386 saloons. With an estimated population of 31,164 in this precinct, the saloons reached 1 for every 80 residents, and this included women and children." (Chicago Tribune, Mar. 18, 1907.)

Witnesses are now living whose memories of former conditions are such that they can testify as to the improvement now as compared with the conditions then. They can testify as to the loads of beer which they saw on the wagons in the city streets and on the railway cars in preprohibition days. They can testify that where they now see 2 or 3 drunken men in a year, they used to see twice that every day of their lives; that where they see no fights and brawls in the alleys and streets now, they used to see them almost every day; and that, except for the poverty caused by the depression, the economic conditions of the people are immeasurably better now than they were before the passage of the eighteenth amendment. History shows that instead of violation of the law causing disrespect for law and growing worse and worse, that if a law is one which is socially justifiable, just the opposite result follows. We do not have an important law on our books today which was not disobeyed worse in the beginning of that law than it is disobeyed today. When the first attempt was made to substitute social control for private killing of people the law was almost altogether flouted for some three centuries; yet the law was not given up for this reason, and century by century it has been obeyed better and better. It is true that there is rumrunning or bootlegging today, but that is nothing new. In the good old days there was both rumrunning and bootlegging, and in the good old days it was both by those not licensed and by the licensed liquor dealers themselves, as we have already shown.

Of one thing the American people should not need any convincing, and that is that the liquor interests are and always have been a lawless crowd. There was never any form of social control which the liquor interests did not try to violate. It made no difference in the good old days whether it was a local option law or a State prohibition law or a Sunday closing law or a sale to minors law, no matter what the nature of the law the liquor interests tried to violate it. They had the same attitude toward the laws then which they now have with reference to the Volstead Act and the eighteenth amendment, and they would have the same attitude toward any new laws that might be applied to them in the future.

It is true that there has been a great deal of nullification of the eighteenth amendment. The amendment has not been enforced as well as it ought to have been enforced. It is, however, enforced at the present time better than it ever has been enforced. One reason for its lack of better enforcement is the conduct of those connected with the Harding regime. Mr. Mellon, the Secretary of the Treasury, may have been a good Secretary of the Treasury, but he certainly was not a "Water-Mellon." The Attorney General of the United States did his level best to sell out the cause of prohibition to the liquor interests. Undoubtedly the conduct of what may be called "the Ohio gang" had a lot to do with building up the big bootleg gangs which have been operating ever since. But, of course, the chief reason for the nullification of the eighteenth amendment has been the wets themselves. The very people who are now complaining that the situation is worse than it used to be and that the eighteenth amendment has not been enforced as well as it ought to be are the men who have tried their level best to prevent its enforcement and to nullify it. In other words, they have been trying to bring about the repeal of the eighteenth amendment by doing everything they possibly could to make it a failure. But the significant thing is that, try as hard as they could, they have not been able to make the situation as bad as it used to be before the eighteenth amendment. People who are acquainted with the facts, of course, know this. All of the people in the United States should know it, but, undoubtedly, a great many people have not had the facts presented to them so that they have been able to form an accurate judgment about the matter, and they have been influenced by the wet propaganda. Thereby the wets have obtained a great many converts to their cause.

Encouraged by their charge that the eighteenth amendment had been a failure, the wets advanced another argument which had been refuted so many times years ago that it is surprising that they dared to present it again, and that is that alcohol as a beverage is a good thing. They have asserted that alcohol taken in moderation helps men. There is a twofold answer to this argument. In the first place, alcohol as a beverage is not a good thing from the standpoint of our social order, because in our highly industrialized economic order with automobiles and dangerous machinery it tends to endanger the safety of people, because the consumption of alcoholic liquors is an economic waste and tends to lower the economic wealth of the country, and because the use of alcoholic liquor as beverages tends to lower the moral standards of the people, especially in the sexual relations. In the second place, alcohol as a beverage is not a good thing from the standpoint of the individual himself. Alcohol drunk in small enough quantities might not hurt many individuals, but some individuals would be hurt by it, and if alcoholic liquor is generally consumed it is sure to be drunk by many people without moderation, and in that case it is always harmful. Alcohol, in other words, does not help anyone; although it may not harm a few, it does harm most people. Alcohol is a narcosis. It operates as a drug. Its first effect is upon the intellect, the youngest part of human personality. It does not quicken the intellect and give it more power. It has a soporific effect upon it. A person loses some of his control over his intellectual facilities. People often seem to be humorous under the influence of alcoholic liquor, and they are sometimes called witty, but this is not due to the fact that they are really witty but because they are behaving in an unusual way. The second effect of alcohol is upon the motor mechanism, the second youngest part of human personality. When a person takes enough alcohol so that it affects his motor mechanism, he begins to stagger around, and we say he is drunk. The third effect of alcoholic liquors consumed is upon the instinct, the oldest part of the human personality. When a person takes alcohol enough so as to affect his instincts he is put to sleep—he is dead drunk. Here the effect of alcohol is just the same as though he had taken chloroform or ether. This shows scientifically how absurd the claim of the wets on this point is.

But perhaps the best answer to the wets is found in a statement of a prohibition speaker back in preprohibition days:

"I believe from the time (alcohol) issues from the coiled and poisonous worm in the distillery until it empties in the hell of death that it is demoralizing to everybody that touches it, from the source to where it ends. * * *

"Alcohol cuts down youth in its prime, manhood in its strength, and age in its weakness. It breaks the father's heart, bereaves the doting mother, extinguishes natural affection, blots out filial attachment, blights parental hope, and brings down mourning age in sorrow to the grave. It produces weakness, not strength; sickness, not health; death, not life. It makes wives widows, children orphans, fathers fiends, and all of them paupers and beggars.

"It feeds rheumatism, nurses gout, welcomes epidemics, invites cholera, imports pestilence, and embraces consumption. It covers the land with idleness, poverty, disease, and crime. It fills jails, supplies almshouses, demands asylums. It engenders controversies, fosters quarrels, and cherishes riots. It crowds penitentiaries and furnishes victims for scaffolds. It is the lifeblood of the gambler, the ailment of the counterfeiter, the prop of the highwayman, and the support of the midnight incendiary. It countenances the liar, respects the thief, and esteems the blasphemer.

"It incites the father to butcher his helpless offspring, helps the husband to massacre his wife, and aids the child to grind the patricidal ax.

"It suborns witnesses, nurses perjury, defiles the jury box, stains the judicial ermine. It bribes voters, corrupts elections, pollutes our institutions, endangers our Government. It degrades the citizen, debases the legislator, dishonors the statesman, disarms the patriot. It brings shame, not honor; terror, not safety; despair, not hope; misery, not happiness. And with the malevolence of a fiend it calmly surveys its frightful desolation, and poisons felicity, kills peace, ruins morals, blights confidence, slays reputation, wipes out our national honor, then curses the world and laughs at its ruin.

"It does all that and more. It murders the soul, it is the sum of all villainies, the father of all crime, the mother of all abominations, the curse of curses, the devil's best friend, and God's worst enemy."

These are the words not of a Puritan, nor a preacher, nor even of an Anti-Saloon Leaguer. They are the words of the great agnostic, Robert G. Ingersoll. It would seem as though if this was the opinion of Colonel Ingersoll about the good of alcoholic liquors that no one else would dare to contend that alcohol as a beverage is a good thing. Yet undoubtedly this recent argument of the wets has had a good deal of influence upon the young present generation.

The last attack of the wets on the eighteenth amendment has been by their claim that the eighteenth amendment is depriving us of a lot of easily obtainable revenue. In these times of depression this argument has made a very strong appeal. People have not taken the time to think it through. Of course it is the same old question which the people confronted 50 years ago when they were considering the question of high license. But in spite of that fact the wets are seriously urging now that we get people to buy liquor who cannot buy food, clothing, fuel, or automobiles, or pay their rent, so that the Government can get a little revenue from them at the expense of their further pauperization. One would suppose that other people who have other things than alcohol to sell and who would find their prospective buyers buying alcoholic liquors instead of their products would want to have something to say on this subject, and one would suppose that those who are interested in the economic welfare of the poor people of our country would have something to say about it. But just now, apparently, the people are not thinking very much about these matters. They are only thinking about some revenue.

All of the above reasons given by the wets, of course, are false reasons. No one of them is any reason for repealing the eighteenth amendment. And these reasons which have been given by the wets are not the real reasons why they want to have the eighteenth amendment repealed. The real reasons have been kept secret. Some of the real reasons why they want to have the eighteenth amendment repealed are the private profits which the brewers and distillers formerly made, and which they would like to make again, and the profits which some other people in the United States today, like the Du Ponts, would like to make by acquiring a monopoly of the liquor business as they now have a monopoly of the powder business.

Another reason why the wets have wanted the eighteenth amendment repealed is to obtain cheap, easily obtainable booze. In the past few years those who have bought alcoholic liquors have had to pay too much for their booze, and they have found it too inconvenient to get, and they therefore would like to have the eighteenth amendment out of the way. A third reason why the wets have wanted to get the eighteenth amendment repealed is to escape taxation. A great many of the rich brewers and distillers and other wets in the United States have been afraid of higher income and inheritance taxes, and they have thought that one way to save themselves from this form of taxation was to get the people of the United States to substitute liquor taxes for these other taxes.

There are three classes of wets, therefore, who are anxious to obtain the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, and no amount of argument would change the position of these three classes. In addition to these three classes of wets there are two others—a fourth class which is opposed to all restrictive legislation, and a fifth class who have been fooled by the wet propaganda in regard to revenue, the desirability of alcohol as a beverage, and the failure of the eighteenth amendment. Perhaps the last two classes can be reached by argument and persuasion.

But all of these five classes together have been strong enough to carry the wet campaign so far as to bring about the enactment of a beer law by the United States Congress providing for the sale of beer with an alcoholic content of 3.2 percent, and similar beer bills by a great number of the States of the Union; and, in addition, the proposal of a new article 21 to the United States Constitution, the effect of which would be the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, if adopted by three fourths of the States of the United States. This marks the high tide of the wet movement.

What is going to be the next period in the history of the prohibition movement? Is it going to be a period which will be characterized by further successes of the wets, or is it going to be a period which will be characterized by a discontinuance of the wet victories and a beginning of a new period of success for the drys? The answer to this question will depend upon the vote of the people of the United States as they go to the polls to choose delegates for the various conventions to be called in the various States of the Union.

These conventions will have nothing to do with the beer bills which have been passed. So far as these beer bills are concerned, the matter is now where it must be left to the United States Supreme Court. If the United States Supreme Court decides that beer of 3.2 percent by weight (or 4 percent by volume) is not intoxicating, then beer with this alcoholic content will be legal everywhere in the United States so far as the eighteenth amendment is concerned, and will undoubtedly be sold in the next period everywhere in the United States, except where some State may pass a law prohibiting it or allow a present law against it to stand. If, however, the United States Supreme Court should decide that beer (or wine) with this alcoholic content is intoxicating, it would, of course, hold that the bill passed by Congress and by the State legislatures permitting the alcoholic content referred to would be in violation of the eighteenth amendment, and then the sale of such liquors would be illegal throughout the United States and we may assume that, theoretically at least, sales of this sort would not occur in the next period.

The main characteristics of the next period, however, will depend upon the action of the people of the United States with reference to the proposed twenty-first amendment.

The people of the United States are now asked to choose between the eighteenth amendment and the twenty-first amendment. The people should, in all fairness, be given a choice between two alternatives. They should be given a choice between the program which the wets sponsor and the program which the drys sponsor. The drys sponsor the prohibition of the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, as is provided in the eighteenth amendment. The wets must have some program which they sponsor. They must sponsor either a program of no social control at all or some other plan of social control than that found in the eighteenth amendment. The people of the United States should be given an opportunity to choose between the program of the drys and the program of the wets, whatever it is. To ask the people of the United States to vote for or against the eighteenth amendment, as the Literary Digest asked the people of the United States to do, does not present any real issue. Heretofore, the wets have said that their program was State rights, but this indicates no program and presents no more issue than voting for or against the eighteenth amendment, because State rights as such is perfectly meaningless. It simply says that they want State control instead of Federal control, but it does not indicate what the control will be if the control is turned over to the States. What the people of the United States should know before they vote is what kind of social control we would have under a State regime as compared with the social control which we now have under the Federal and State regime. They should know whether or not there is to be no social control whatever in the States or whether that control is to be high license or local option, or State prohibition, or private monopoly, or State governmental sale. Until they know this, they are not in any position to vote intelligently. Furthermore, to talk about State control or State rights as against Federal control is not only meaningless; it is not the kind of social control which we should have.

The liquor question is either a question of national interest or local interest. The one thing that it is not is a matter of State interest. There are greater differences in their interests in the liquor question between the city of New York and the rest of the State of New York, or between Chicago and the rest of the State of Illinois, than there are between the States of New York and Illinois and the United States as a whole. If the United States as a whole ought not to impose a dry social control upon the State of New York, then the State of New York ought not to impose a wet social control upon the dry parts of the State of New York. As a matter of fact, the prohibition question is probably a matter of national interest. This was so held by the United States Supreme Court years ago when the question came before it, and the Supreme Court held, as a consequence, that the Federal Government had the exclusive power to regulate the transportation of intoxicating liquors in interstate commerce. This is also the position of the Wickersham Commission by a vote of 9 to 2. The State rights slogan has simply been a red herring which the wets have drawn across the prohibition issue to divert attention from their real program.

Yet in spite of what has been said the proposed twenty-first amendment has done just what has been said should not have been done. The twenty-first amendment does not expressly present any real issue to the American people. The first section of the proposed amendment simply provides for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. The second section of the proposed amendment prohibits the shipment of liquor into dry States or Territories from wet States. This second section is another red herring which has been drawn across the prohibition question. Section 2 means practically nothing, because it prohibits only what the Federal Government already has the power to prohibit under the interstate commerce clause of the United States Constitution and what Congress has already prohibited by the Wilson Act, the Webb-Kenyon Act, and the Reed amendment, which statutes were not repealed by the eighteenth amendment and are still law.

Disregarding, therefore, section 2 and turning our attention to section 1, what do we have? We simply have a provision for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. The section does not set up any alternative plan. So far as the proposed twenty-first amendment is concerned, anything would be possible. No social control at all would be possible. The return of the open saloon would be possible. Advertising of liquors in the newspapers and over the radio would be possible, and, of course, the newspapers are aching for the revenue which they could thereby obtain; and this is one reason, undoubtedly, for their enthusiasm for the wet cause. High license, or local option, or a legal monopoly, or States' sale would be possible. But the twenty-first amendment says nothing about any of these things. Of course, it is known that just as truly as the eighteenth amendment is repealed and the prohibition law is discontinued there must be some other alternative plan, and some or all of the other alternatives which have been suggested will be put into operation. For this reason the only thing to do is to consider all of these alternatives. Every voter voting on the proposed twenty-first amendment is either voting for prohibition as found in the eighteenth amendment or he is voting for some one of these other alternatives--only he, of course, does not know which. In other words, the wets are asking the voters to go to the polls and to sign a blank check for the wets to fill in as they want to as they are not prevented by each of the various States into which they will proceed.

One alternative which we must consider is the return of the open saloon. Just as surely as the eighteenth amendment is repealed the saloon will return in such States as Maryland, Pennsylvania, New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Illinois, and Wisconsin, and after it has returned in these States it will undoubtedly return in other adjoining States, at least for a while. Every voter who goes to the polls, therefore, is making a choice between our present plan of social control and the return of the open saloon in some of the States of the United States, if not in all of them. The American saloon was one of the most hideous things that has ever been known by man. If there ever was a hell on earth, it was the American saloon. There are many, of course, who desire its return, but even they do not dare to speak a good word for it.

The Wickersham Commission, by a vote of 9 to 2, pronounced against the saloon in any State of the United States, no matter what otherwise the people of the United States might decide to do with the liquor traffic. Even Senator WALSH, of Massachusetts, who was one of the outstanding leaders of the liquor interests in the last Democratic convention, later, upon the floor of the United States Senate, said it would be impossible to get a repeal of the eighteenth amendment unless the people of the United States were guaranteed against the return of the open saloon. The Congress which submitted the proposed twenty-first amendment was urged to incorporate a guaranty against the return of the open saloon. Yet it refused to insert any such provision in article 21. What was the reason for this? The only possible reason is that they, or the liquor interests for whom they were speaking, wanted and proposed to get the return of the open saloon. Consequently, every voter must realize that he is making this among other choices when he goes to the polls.

Another possible choice which the voters must make would be between our present prohibition law and no social control whatever. A plan of no social control would, of course, please the wets more than any other plan. Under that they could make their profits; they could obtain their booze cheaply and easily; and they would escape the taxation which they fear. They would be freed from all other restrictions like those in regard to sale to minors and Sunday closing. But the evils of the liquor traffic have been so well established and the sentiment of the United States on this matter has been so well crystallized that, of course, the wets do not hope for any such alternative as this. As a consequence, the voters probably need not fear that this plan would be written into their blank check in any State of the Union if they should vote for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

High license, however, would be another alternative which they ought to give serious consideration. If the voters of the United States should vote for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, high license would be adopted in a great many States, if not in all. It would be adopted, undoubtedly, in all of those States which allowed open saloons. This method of handling the liquor traffic has already been tried in the United States 50 or more years ago and it has been found wanting. There are no new arguments for high license. High license solves no problems in connection with the liquor traffic, but rather increases the problems. The only thing which it can be claimed that high license does is to produce revenue, and this is economically unsound, because at the same time it produces revenue for the Government and takes some burdens of taxation off from the people, it so decreases the economic power of the people who buy alcoholic liquors that they become poorer and poorer, and they would be better off if they paid taxes.

Local option and State prohibition are two other alternatives, and there is a possibility that if the eighteenth amendment was repealed some of the States in the Union might adopt one or the other of these plans. Hence, voters in going to the polls are also choosing between our present plan of control of the liquor traffic and local option and State prohibition. The trouble with local option and State prohibition would be the same trouble which the people of the United States used to have. There would be no way of protecting the people in the dry States or in the dry districts from the liquor interests in the wet States.

There are two other possible alternatives. One would be a private monopoly and the other State or governmental sale, either with or without drinking on the premises (saloons). If drinking on the premises were permitted, this plan would be so nearly like those we have already considered that it needs no further discussion. If drinking on the premises was prohibited, we should have a plan similar to that which obtains in Canada. Under the Canadian system, there is a combination of private monopoly and governmental sale. It is true that where drinking on the premises is not allowed, the evils of the old saloon are more or less eliminated, but the evils of drinking alcoholic liquors would not be eliminated, and perhaps they might even be increased. In that case, people would almost be encouraged by public authority to drink alcoholic liquors. There would be the stamp of popular approval upon the business.

The Canadian experience is proof that the consumption of alcoholic liquors increases. In Canada the consumption of alcoholic liquors has doubled in the last 4 years. Now permits for the use of alcoholic liquors have been issued to more than one half of the people. Bootlegging would not be stopped by these schemes. In Canada bootlegging still continues, but mostly with people who have not taken out permits. Hence, if the liquor interests should finally decide to write in either or both of these plans of controlling the liquor traffic in the blank check which they are asking the voters to give them, the choice would not be much better than it would be if they were going to write in the open saloon or any of the other alternatives. It is doubtful if the people of the United States want to put their governments into the liquor business.

We have now named all the possible alternatives to the program of social control of the liquor traffic found in the eighteenth amendment. The choice between these alternatives and the program of social control of the eighteenth amendment is the choice which the voter must make when he chooses between the eighteenth amendment and the proposed twenty-first amendment. There are no other alternatives to the present plan which can be suggested. No one has thought of any other plans. There is no possibility of any other plans. The choice is a choice between our present plan and those we have named.

No one of these alternatives is better than our present plan. Probably each one of these would be worse than our present plan. Everyone will have to admit that the situation would be worse than it now is if the open saloon were allowed to return. High license, or local option, or State prohibition, or legal monopoly, or State governmental sale would be worse. All of these but the last two have already been tried in the United States and found wanting, and the last two have been tried in Canada and found wanting. If the voters were given a direct choice between any one or all of these alternatives and our present plan of social control, they would undoubtedly overwhelmingly vote for our present plan. The wets probably know this, and that is probably the reason why they have asked for a blank check instead of giving the voters this direct issue. But the fact that they have concealed their program for the time being, does not change the issue.

Any voter who votes for the proposed twenty-first amendment to the United States Constitution is voting for the open saloon, high license, local option, State prohibition, legal monopoly, and State governmental sale somewhere in the United States. The voter should get this point clearly. This is the real issue in the present campaign. The voters should not deceive themselves into thinking that they are going to the polls to correct some of the evils in connection with the eighteenth amendment if they vote against it. Rather they are going to vote for all of the evils of preprohibition days, including the open saloon.

It may be answered that there is no objection to this, that if one State wants an open saloon and another State wants prohibition and another State wants governmental sale, that this should be allowed. The trouble with this suggestion is that, after all, this is still one country and not 48 different countries, and the people in one part of the country have some right to say what the people in every other part of the country should do. No one State can live alone. It cannot escape the effects of what is done in other States.

One thing is sure. This Nation can not remain permanently half wet and half dry. It will have to become either all one or all the other. There is no solution of the liquor problem in compromise. Compromises only postpone the evil day. Some time the issue will have to be met, and the people of the United States will have to decide whether this country is going to be wet or dry. If it is going to become wet, then the drys must live under the domination of the wets; and if it is to become dry, then the wets must live under the domination of the drys. There is no other alternative in the case of prohibition, any more than there was in the case of slavery.

A moral question, and prohibition is a moral question, is, however, never settled until it is settled right. The wets have refused to acquiesce in the settlement proposed by the drys in the eighteenth amendment. If the wets should succeed in repealing the eighteenth amendment, the question would be no nearer to settlement. The drys would no more acquiesce in the social control which would follow the twenty-first amendment than the wets have acquiesced in the social control of the eighteenth amendment. The wets have been impelled and are impelled by selfish motives. The drys seem to be impelled by the motive of the creation of a better social order. This would seem to indicate that the drys have the right side of this moral question. If so, all that the wets would accomplish by repealing the eighteenth amendment would be to turn back the wheels of progress 50 or more years and force the moral forces of our country to fight over again all the battles which have already been fought once in the United States. That they again would finally win there can be no doubt. Human progress demands the triumph of prohibition, because prohibition is the cause of humanity and country. If this is going to be the final goal in the United States, why should the people of the United States deliberately postpone for a few years the attainment of this final goal?

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, April 10, 1933, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE

MONDAY, APRIL 10, 1933

(Legislative day of Monday, Mar. 13, 1933)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. REED. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] on account of illness.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

FUNCTIONS OF THE FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION (S.DOC. NO. 18)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, transmitting, pursuant to Senate Resolution 351, Seventy-second Congress, a detailed report of the functions of the Commission, including accounting, disbursing, collecting, purchasing, and personnel, together with a statement of the statutory authority for the performance of each function and the annual cost thereof, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Concurrent resolution memorializing the President of the United States, the Congress of the United States, and the Secretary of Agriculture that it is the sense of the members of the Minnesota Legislature that the United States Department of Agriculture cause a reduction in the yardage fees and feed charges of at least 30 percent of the present prices and that commission fees of commission firms operating in the terminal markets of the State of Minnesota be likewise reduced at least 15 percent of the present charges

Whereas under present economic conditions and the prices paid for livestock in our terminal markets the charges for yardage and feed by those controlling such service and commodities are not only greatly in excess of the services and facilities furnished and commodities sold therefor, but are equally in excess of the value of such service and the cost of such commodities; and

Whereas due to such economic conditions and the prices of livestock the commission fees of the commission firms operating in the terminal markets in this State are likewise exorbitant, unreasonable, and in excess of the value thereof and constitute a serious and unreasonable burden on the producer of livestock; and

Whereas it is our opinion that the yardage fees and also feed charges in the terminal markets in this State should be reduced at least 30 percent of the present amount and the commission fees of the commission firms operating in such terminal markets should likewise be reduced at least 15 percent of the present charges: Now, therefore, be it hereby

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the United States Department of Agriculture and the Secretary thereof be hereby petitioned to forthwith cause a reduction in the yardage fees and feed charges of at least 30 percent of present prices and that the commission fees of commission firms operating in the terminal markets in this State be likewise reduced at least 15 percent of the present charges; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the State of Minnesota be and he is hereby instructed to transmit certified copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of Agriculture, to the presiding officers of the Senate and the House of Representatives, and to each Member thereof of the State of Minnesota.

CHAS. MUNN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
K. K. SOLBERG,
President of the Senate.

Passed by the house of representatives the 1st day of April 1933.
FRANK T. STARKEY,
Chief Clerk House of Representatives.

Passed by the senate the 3d day of April 1933.
G. H. SPAETH,
Secretary of the Senate.

Approved April 5, 1933.
FLOYD B. OLSON,
Governor of the State of Minnesota.

Filed April 5, 1933.
MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of the State of Minnesota.

I, Mike Holm, secretary of state of the State of Minnesota, do hereby certify that I have compared the annexed copy with record of the original resolution in my office of House File No. 1826, being Resolution 12, Laws of 1933, and that said copy is a true and correct transcript of said resolution and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State at the capitol, in St. Paul, Minn., this 5th day of April 1933.

[SEAL]
MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Senate Joint Memorial 6 (by Senators Herrin, Knous, Sanders, Peiffer, Ehrhart, Smith, Hill, Rumbaugh, Houston, Nelson, Manly, and Unfug)

A memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States to include adequate appropriations for the continued efficient maintenance of supervision of oil, gas, coal, and nonmetallic minerals operations by the Mineral Leasing Division of the United States Geological Survey

Whereas the Congress of the United States on February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. 437), on June 4, 1920 (41 Stat. 812), and March 4, 1923 (42 Stat. 1448), and under special agreement by the United States, passed certain laws regulating production of oil, gas, coal, and nonmetallic minerals on the public domain; and

Whereas one of the provisions of the act of February 25, 1920, provides that 10 percent of all moneys collected as royalties, bonuses, and rentals shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and credited as miscellaneous receipts, and that 37½ percent shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury after the expiration of the fiscal year to the State within the boundaries of which the leased lands or deposits are or were located, and that 52½ percent shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of a reclamation fund created by act of Congress approved June 17, 1902; and

Whereas the States of Colorado and other Western States own a large number of tracts of land within and adjacent to the lands of the United States, and which said lands are in grave danger of being damaged by reason of the improper drilling, mining, and producing operations, and lack of efficient supervision in the event the said Mineral Leasing Division of the United States Geological Survey is rendered less efficient by reason of the appropriation of insufficient funds by the Congress of the United States for continuing efficient and proper field supervision of said operations, and thereby both the National and State Governments will suffer by reason of lack of careful drilling and mining operations and production by irresponsible and careless operators; and

Whereas the said Mineral Leasing Division is one of the few agencies of our Government which is self-supporting and which uses only approximately 5 percent of the money collected by the Government in its supervisory operations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Twenty-ninth General Assembly of the State of Colorado, That the general assembly hereby urge and request that the Congress of the United States of America make the appropriations for the Mineral Leasing Division of the Geological Survey sufficient to enable the said Division to function efficiently for the protection of the oil, gas, coal, and nonmetallic mineral resources of the Western States of the United States, which States are vitally interested, both directly and indirectly, in the conservation of our oil, gas, coal, and nonmetallic mineral resources; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt; the Vice President of the United States; the Secretary of the Interior of the United States; the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States; the Director of the Bureau of the Budget of the United States; to the United States Senators and Representatives of the State of Colorado; and to the Governors of the several Western States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the Senate of Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

House Joint Memorial 4 (by Representatives Palmer, Constantine, Fisher, and Hirschfeld)

Whereas the State of Colorado has been throughout its history one of the most important mining States in the Union, and its growth and prosperity has been and will continue to be intimately connected with and dependent upon the mining industry; and

Whereas there is a noticeable and increasing tendency toward a revival of the mining industry in this State which if consummated will create new wealth, assist in relieving the unemployment problem, and stimulate a like revival both in agriculture and commerce; and

Whereas to accomplish the expected revival of the mininm industry in this State a constant flow of new capital will be required for the financing of the industry, and no obstacle should be placed in the way of such financing; and

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States a bill "To provide for the furnishing of information and the supervision of traffic in investment securities in interstate commerce", known as the Federal Securities Act, section 14 of which provides in substance, among other interstate sale restrictions, that it shall be unlawful to use the facilities of interstate commerce in the sale of securities in any other State without complying with the securities acts of that State; and

Whereas compliance with the provisions of said section 14 would so hamper, restrict, and cripple the issuance of securities by mining companies in this State in the sale of their securities in other States that none could be sold, thus the present mining revival in this State would be brought to an abrupt close and the progress of Colorado would to that extent be stopped: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives of the twenty-ninth general assembly (the senate concurring herein), That the Congress of the United States is hereby respectfully memorialized and urged to eliminate said section 14 from the Federal Securities Act or to make such necessary amendments therein as will prevent the unjust economic results to the State of Colorado as are herein set forth; and be it further

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives of the State of Colorado in the Congress of the United States be requested to take such necessary steps as will correct the evil herein denounced, and that copies of this memorial be forwarded forthwith to the President of the Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of Congress, and to the Senators and Representatives of the State of Colorado in Congress.

BYRON G. ROGERS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JAMES H. CARR,
Chief Clerk.
RAY H. TALBOT,
President of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to provide machinery for the loaning of money to needy financial institutions

Whereas due to the present economic depression millions of people are out of employment and in dire need of ready cash to meet daily financial requirements; and

Whereas millions of dollars of these people's savings are tied up as frozen assets in financial institutions; and

Whereas many of these people and financial institutions have good collateral upon which they cannot realize due to the present money stringency: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of Wisconsin hereby respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to provide the necessary machinery and credit to make possible loans to the financial institutions having frozen assets upon satisfactory collateral; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to both Houses of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

C. T. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
THOMAS J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which were ordered to lie on the table:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution memorializing Congress to promptly enact the administration farm relief bill

Whereas the farm relief bill recommended to Congress by President Roosevelt is a measure which seems likely to prove of real value to the farmers, as indicated by the fact that farm prices have advanced in anticipation of the passage of this measure; and

Whereas while Congress has acted with great speed on all other recommendations made by the President, the Senate, after prompt passage of the farm relief bill in the House, has seen fit to hold up this measure; and

Whereas action on the farm relief bill, to be of much value during the present year, should be taken before completion of the seeding season on farms, which is already far advanced in a large part of the country: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Wisconsin Legislature hereby respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States, and particularly the United States Senate, to take prompt and favorable action on the farm relief bill which has been presented by President Roosevelt to Congress; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to both Houses of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

THOMAS J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
C. T. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution relating to reforestation in Wisconsin and other Lake States as a part of the President's emergency program for providing employment

Whereas President Roosevelt is expected to submit to the Congress in the very near future a comprehensive program for providing employment to not less than 500,000 of the unemployed in necessary reforestation, reclamation, flood control, and similar projects: and

Whereas a plan has been worked out by the Federal forestry service for a comprehensive reforestation program to be carried out on lands now owned or to be acquired by the Federal Government in Wisconsin and other Lake States, which program would afford employment to many thousands of unemployed men and involve an expenditure within these States of millions of dollars; and

Whereas reforestation is a vital need in this State, which has approximately 16,000,000 of acres of land which are unsuitable for agriculture but can be productively utilized for forestry; and

Whereas of all expenditures for reforestation 80 percent of every dollar goes to common labor, so that an extensive reforestation project in this State will help out very materially in solving the serious unemployment situation which now prevails: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of Wisconsin hereby respectfully memorializes the President and the Congress of the United States to include a comprehensive reforestation project in Wisconsin and neighboring States in the emergency program for providing employment; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to President Roosevelt, both Houses of the Congress of the United States, and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

C. T. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN H. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
THOMAS J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by a mass meeting of citizens at Williston, N.Dak., serving notice upon the Governor of North Dakota and the Congress of the United States that " unless adequate supplies of food and clothing and garden seeds are supplied within 30 days, we propose to take such supplies wherever they can be found ", which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also laid before the Senate a petition of sundry citizens of Chicago, Ill., praying for the prompt passage of legislation to provide free transportation to Liberia, West Africa, including 1 year's supplies for all of those of African descent who would voluntarily go within the ensuing 10 years, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by Old Glory Post, No. 2044, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, San Francisco, Calif., expressing confidence in President Roosevelt and the rulings of his administration and memorializing the President in the matter of pensions, disabilities, etc., to give the utmost care and consideration to the cases of service-connected disability and to the aged and infirm, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH presented resolutions adopted by the General Court of Massachusetts, condemning all acts of persecution reported to be committed against members of the Jewish faith in Germany, and urging the presentation of such sentiments to the German Government, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(See resolutions printed in full when laid before the Senate by the Vice President on the 6th instant, p. 1322, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. COPELAND presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the secretary of the stock exchange reform committee of the Manhattan Board of Commerce, of New York City, N.Y., praying for the passage of legislation providing for the regulation in interstate commerce of the sale of investment securities, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Irish-American Independent Political Unit, Inc., of Brooklyn, N.Y., protesting against the ratification of the World Court protocols, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted at Buffalo by a citizens' protest meeting, and by the Maccabee Athletic Club, of Brooklyn, and the Bronx Jewish Democratic Club, Inc., of the Bronx, in the State of New York, protesting against the persecution and alleged mistreatment of the Jews in Germany, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the New York State Chapter, Daughters of Founders and Patriots of America, of New York City, N.Y., protesting against the recognition of the Soviet Government of Russia by the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Brooklyn, N.Y., praying for the passage of legislation imposing a tax on income derived from United States bonds, and increasing the rates on second-class and parcel-post mail matter, and also increasing passport fees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Erie County Committee of the American Legion of Buffalo, N.Y., favoring the retention of the present field offices of the Veterans' Administration, and particularly the Buffalo regional office, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Common Council of the City of Buffalo, and the South Side Democratic Club, of Buffalo, in the State of New York, protesting against the ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty with Canada, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Substitute Post Office Employees' Association, of New York City, N.Y., protesting against the application of the provisions of recent economy legislation to substitute post-office employees, and favoring an increase in their salaries to correspond with the 1928 level, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KEAN presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY.

Joint Resolution 4, Laws of 1933

A joint resolution memorializing the Senate of the United States to ratify the treaties now pending before it relating to the adherence of the United States to the World Court

Whereas the present economic disturbance in this country and throughout the rest of the world is directly related to the late war and to the present lack of international confidence; and

Whereas the completion of the adherence of the United States to the World Court as one practicable substitute for war would be a stabilizing influence in world affairs; and

Whereas the United States is in good faith bound to make effective the resolution passed by the United States Senate 7 years ago, in 1926, by a vote of 76 to 17, providing for the entry of this country into the Court if five conditions were met; and

Whereas in the view of the Department of State, the American Bar Association, and the New Jersey Bar Association these five conditions are entirely met by the three World Court treaties now on the United States Senate's Executive Calendar; and

Whereas to subject to further postponement a question which is of first importance and which has already been before the Senate and the country in some form for 10 years is a contradiction of sound legislative procedure: Be it

Resolved by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey:

1. That the Legislature of the State of New Jersey respectfully urges the Senate of the United States speedily to ratify the three pending World Court treaties, thus completing the adherence of the United States to the World Court.

2. That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the Honorable HAMILTON F. KEAN and the Honorable W. WARREN BARBOUR, the representatives of this State in the United States Senate.

3. This joint resolution shall take effect immediately.

Approved March 14, 1933.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Thomas A. Mathis, secretary of state of the State of New Jersey, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of an act passed by the legislature of this State and approved by the Governor the 14th day of March A.D. 1933, as taken from and compared with the original now on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal at Trenton this 16th day of March 1933.

[SEAL] THOMAS A. MATHIS,
Secretary of State.

Mr. BAILEY presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Joint Resolution 37

A joint resolution endorsing the proposal of President Roosevelt to develop a vast national laboratory in which to combine agricultural development, flood control, power development, and the reclamation of the forests in the valley of the Tennessee River and its tributaries

Whereas President Franklin D. Roosevelt has recently recommended the logical and coordinated development of the Tennessee River Valley and watershed as a "vast internal development encompassing reforestation, reclamation, water power, and agricultural rehabilitation, with the aim of balancing the national population anew between cities and the country"; and

Whereas Mr. Roosevelt has made known his purpose, as he takes office on March 4, to ask the various Government departments involved to make surveys with a view to putting the proposition up to Congress at an early date: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Tennessee Valley project as outlined and enthusiastically proposed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt is hereby heartily endorsed as a reasonable, far-reaching, and constructive effort to furnish productive work for the unemployed and as a "vast national laboratory in which to combine the five elements of agricultural development—flood control, power development, reclamation, and reforestation—into a single coordinated movement to improve human life."

SEC. 2. That the facilities and cooperation of the State departments dealing with the natural and human resources involved are hereby pledged to the President and the Congress in the planning and carrying out of this project so far as the law and available financial resources will permit.

SEC. 3. That copies of this resolution be sent by the secretary of state to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Interior, the Secretary of Commerce, the United States Senators from North Carolina, and the Members of the House of Representatives of North Carolina.

SEC. 4. That this resolution shall be in full force and effect from and after its ratification.

In the general assembly, read three times and ratified this the 5th day of April 1933.

R. L. HARRIS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
A. H. GRAHAM,
President of the Senate.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Stacey W. Wade, secretary of state of the State of North Carolina, do hereby certify the foregoing and attached (two sheets) to be a true copy from the records of this office.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal.

Done in office at Raleigh this 6th day of April A.D. 1933.

[SEAL] STACEY W. WADE,
Secretary of State.

ATHLETIC EQUIPMENT FOR EX-SERVICE MEN

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana presented a communication embodying a resolution adopted by the American Legion, Disabled American Veterans, Spanish-American War Veterans, and Veterans of Foreign Wars, all of the Department of Indiana, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas there are today thousands of mentally deficient ex-service men in Veterans' Administration homes and hospitals who are desperately in need of some kind of physical exercise and training; and

Whereas no provision at the present has been made to provide suitable athletic garments in which to take exercise of this kind; and

Whereas the United States Army and Navy have on hand thousands of athletic garments, gym shoes, socks, sweaters, and other wearing apparel listed as surplus stock which they are selling at cost; and

Whereas this surplus stock could be used to better equip the men in the hospitals and homes for their benefit in calisthenics with little cost to the Government: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the following recognized service organizations in meeting assembled the 20th day of February 1933 do hereby petition the Senate to pass legislation whereby surplus stock which can be used for this purpose be allotted the Veterans' Administration for the comfort of ex-service men during gymnastics.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. MCCARRAN. Mr. President, I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nevada memorializing Congress for the passage of the Wheeler silver bill, providing for the remonetization of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NEVADA,
Department of State, ss:

I, W. G. Greathouse, the duly elected, qualified, and acting secretary of state of the State of Nevada, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true, full, and correct copy of the original Senate Joint Resolution No. 14, introduced by Senator Marsh February 15, 1933, now on file and of record in this office.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of state at my office in Carson City, Nev., this 6th day of March A.D. 1933.

[SEAL] W. G. GREATHOUSE,
Secretary of State.

Senate joint resolution memorializing Congress to pass the so-called Wheeler bill, providing for the coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1

Whereas there is now pending before Congress an act introduced by Senator WHEELER, of Montana, providing for the coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1; and

Whereas the silver industry is of vital importance to the people of the State of Nevada; and

Whereas it is the belief of the people of this State that the enactment of the said measure will restore prosperity to our State in a greater degree than any other measure or plan before Congress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of Nevada, That Congress be urged to enact the so-called "Wheeler bill" into law; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state transmit certified copies of this resolution to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to our Senators and Representative in Congress.

MORLEY GRISWOLD,
President of Senate.
V. R. MERIALDO,
Secretary of Senate.
FRED S. ALWARD,
Speaker of the Assembly.
GEORGE BRODIGAN,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

STATE OF NEVADA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

Approved March 6, 1933, 9:10 a.m.

F. B. BALZAR, Governor.

RELIEF OF INSURANCE COMPANIES—AMENDMENTS

Mr. DILL submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1094) to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. WALSH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1094) to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies, which was ordered to lie on the table, to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 3, after line 25, insert the following new section:

"SEC. 4. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall not make any loans under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, or under the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, (1) if at the time of such loan any officer, director, or employee of the applicant is receiving compensation at a rate in excess of $17,500, and (2) unless at such time the applicant agrees to the satisfaction of the corporation not to increase the compensation of any of its officers, directors, or employees while such loan is outstanding. For the purposes of this section the term 'compensation' includes any salary, fee, bonus, commission, or other payment, direct or indirect, in money or otherwise, for personal services."

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE—AMENDMENTS

Mr. KING and Mr. MCKELLAR each submitted an amendment, and Mr. SHIPSTEAD submitted four amendments, intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power, which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. CAREY submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to House bill 3835, the agricultural relief bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

MURIEL CRICHTON

Mr. COPELAND submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 60), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is authorized and directed to pay, out of the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1933, to Muriel Crichton, such sums, not to exceed a reasonable amount, as may be necessary to defray her expenses incurred for hospitalization and medical care as a result of injuries suffered in the Senate wing of the Capitol Building.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

FRENCH ADVERTISING FOR FOREIGN MARKETS

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a press dispatch from Mr. Wallace Carroll, staff correspondent to the United Press, dated Paris, April 10. It is an analysis of the report on the budget estimate delivered to the French Chamber on the item of 33,000,000 francs for foreign propaganda. It is evidently an exceedingly interesting report in that it shows the activities of the French Government, particularly in its attempt to increase its foreign trade. I think it is a matter of very great importance at this particular time when we are dealing with legislation attempting to raise farm-commodity prices.

I have always felt that we were neglecting the foreign markets for our surplus exportable farm products. It is interesting to see the great extent to which the French Government is going in this direction. The French Government has already, during the past 2 years, been engaged in this work, largely in South America and the Orient, while I think that we have practically neglected South America and the Orient during all that period of time, notwithstanding the very strong efforts of some of us to attract attention to that great trade. As later in this debate I intend to say something with regard to the trade of the Orient and of South America and a method of enabling them to purchase our exportable surplus, as they did in 1929 and prior thereto, I ask leave to have this dispatch to the United Press, which has been published in part in the morning newspapers served by the United Press and the remainder of it to be published in the afternoon newspapers, printed in the RECORD as a part of my statement.

I wish to say further, Mr. President, that of course I do not vouch for the accuracy of all the statements contained in the dispatch, because part of it is paraphrased; but there are certain quotations from the Budget report which are probably accurate. The report which has been quoted or paraphrased is not private, but is a public document and is exceedingly interesting. I have been informed by the Associated Press that it has just transmitted upon its wires the following statement:

The Associated Press is not engaged, never has been engaged, and will not engage in any propaganda service for any country—which, of course, includes France.

The Associated Press has now, has had, and will continue to have its own American news staff in Paris, which is responsible to the Associated Press for covering the news of France.

More than that, the Associated Press has never even been entreated by the Havas Agency or any department of the French Government to engage on its own account or jointly with Havas or anyone else in the carrying of French propaganda.

There being no objection, the dispatch was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Wallace Carroll, United Press staff correspondent

PARIS, April 10.—The French Government has organized an amazing program to flood the United States with pro-French propaganda, utilizing prominent press services, newspapers, magazines, public speakers, and the radio to accomplish its purposes.

Its program, contemplating the set-up of an all-embracing department of American publicity to counteract German, Italian, and other agencies, was revealed in the budget of the Foreign Office submitted to the Chamber of Deputies, and containing detailed explanations of an item of 33,000,000 francs (approximately $1,320,000) demanded by the Foreign Department in the new budget for its propaganda network.

Acquiescing in the department's demand for the publicity fund, the Chamber of Deputies adopted the budget.

The French plan as revealed in the Foreign Office explanation to the chamber is designed to reach the American people by the following methods:

First. Through the American press by a collaboration of the Agence Havas, the official French news agency, and the Associated Press of America.

Second. The introduction and furthering of French movies.

Third. Sunday night broadcasts by wireless to the United States via the British station at Rugby.

Fourth. The writing of pro-French articles for American magazines, presumably by well-known authors.

Fifth. The dispatch of lecturers and public speakers on missions to be directed by the home bureau.

In explanation of its purposes the foreign department said that "the American people go to no trouble to inform themselves. We must place before their eyes some simple truths."

"We must remember", it continued, "that the American, above all else, is a business man. He knows how to count. He is dominated by a sporting spirit. An American may honestly ruin his best friend just to prove he is the stronger—and then offer him his hand and help him to arise. Friendship has nothing to do with his business.

"The American people are ignorant of their own history. They must not be expected to know French history.

"The American female element has an important viewpoint. We must particularly address ourselves to them."

Describing the proper manner of "reaching" the American press, the budget explanation states that the Government has decided on a plan of getting to newspapers in the United States directly without using the correspondents stationed in Paris.

"This would be done", it says, "through the collaboration of the Agence Havas and the Associated Press of America."

The report verges on the humorous when it describes the method of attracting public attention in the United States to the French cause. It urges that good-looking, active young speakers be sent to the United States, "instead of unhealthy-looking, decrepit, tired, feverish, worn-out, coughing, and trembling old men bound into frock coats."

"They have to be put to bed upon their arrival, with hot-water bottles at their feet, and be awakened just in time for their conferences, when they are rushed to the station with a thousand precautions", it continued. "That is why France is pictured as a tired, worn-out country."

Nearly 100 pages of the official budgetary document are devoted to American propaganda plans.

The whole propaganda program, contained in a 175-page official document of the Foreign Office, devoted the first 59 pages to details of reorganization of the Foreign Office press bureau, and then said:

"As concerns America, profound inquiries have been made among French personalities who recently have returned from the United States concerning the anti-French campaign and means of defeating it, as well as inquiry among American personalities and American journalists resident in Paris. These inquiries have allowed us to establish a general basic plan to be undertaken in the near future by the development of the press service at the Quai D'Orsay, through collaboration of the Associated Press and the Havas News Agency. * * *

"Our program consists of gathering European news and organizing the diffusion of this news, as judiciously adapted as possible, to foreign countries. The extent of this program has required several steps: First, in 1931 and through 1932, our efforts were consecrated to the organization and the diffusion of European news of French origin to South America, the Orient, and north Africa.

"It is hoped by the end of 1933 to circulate this news throughout Europe insofar as circumstances in each country permit.

"It will be possible to reach the United States and, in a general fashion, all North American nations otherwise than through the intermediary of foreign newspaper correspondents.

"The Quai D'Orsay press section is now organizing for the direction, through the collaboration of one of our principal news agencies, of French news going abroad, especially to America. The Quai D'Orsay assures the technical and financial control of this news service."

The budget report states, in connection with the French propaganda, that propaganda expenditures during 1933 of nine European governments, as listed in the budget, show a total estimate of 602,000,000 francs (about $24,000,000), as follows:

	Francs
Germany	256,000,000
Italy	119,000,000
France	71,000,000
ALL DEPARTMENTS
Great Britain	69,000,000
Poland	26,000,000
Hungary	23,000,000
Czechoslovakia	18,000,000
Jugoslavia	13,000,000
Rumania	7,000,000

SOCIAL ISSUES BEFORE THE SUPREME COURT—ARTICLE BY FELIX FRANKFURTER

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have in my hand a copy of the Yale Review, of the spring issue of 1933, in which is an article written by the Honorable Felix Frankfurter on the subject of the Social Issues Before the Supreme Court. I regard the article as being exceedingly interesting and informative, and ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In this the fourth winter of our discontent it is no longer temerarious or ignorant to believe that this depression has a significance very different from prior economic stresses in our national history. "The more things change the more they remain the same" is an epigram of comfortable cynicism. There are new periods in history, and we are in the midst of one of them. Not that the new era has come overnight. Epochal changes germinate slowly, and dates in history are deluding. They mark end as much as beginning. To say that even the World War ushered in a new era is to foreshorten events. To be sure, the debacle of three mighty empires, the Russian revolution and its violent break with the past, the dislocation of a world economy, the emergence and resurgence of nationalism, the intensification of technological processes induced by the war, all loosed economic and social forces far more upsetting to the preexisting equilibrium than the changes wrought by the French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars. But these powerful solvents only reinforced major influences operating in our national economy. The absorption of free land, the steady drift from rural to a predominantly urban society, with economic consequences of changes in both the distribution of population and the significant decline in the rate of its growth, the attainment of the saturation point in railroad construction—itself an index of the general shift from the winning of a new country to its maintenance—the implications of technological advances both in industry and agriculture, the enormous extension of leisure among the mass of people, the new areas of foreign industrial and agricultural competition, the vast burden of public and private indebtedness—these have for some time been powerfully at work in the making of a new American economic society.

Unfortunately, these new forces left substantially untouched the direction of our political action. We assumed a continuing validity for the economic theories of pioneer America while fact was insidiously undermining theory. Recognition was lacking of the need for adequate social control of our transforming material development. To realize that there is a new economic order and to realize it passionately is the central equipment for modern statesmanship. "The world", writes Sir Arthur Salter, "is now at one of the great crossroads of history. The system, usually termed 'capitalist', but I think better termed 'competitive', under which the western world has made its astonishing progress of the last century and a half, has developed deep-seated defects which will threaten its existence unless they can be cured. We need to reform, and in larger measure to transform this system. We need so to improve the framework of law, of institutions, of custom, and of public direction and control that the otherwise free activities and competitive enterprises of man, instead of destroying each other, will inure to the general good. In the organization of industry, of credit, and of money we need to supplement the automatic processes of adjustment by deliberate planning. This is the specific task of our age. If we fail, the only alternatives are chaos or the substitution of a different system inconsistent with political and personal liberty, perhaps after an intervening period of collapse and anarchy."

In our scheme of government readjustment to great social changes means juristic readjustment. Our basic problems—whether of industry, agriculture, or finance—sooner or later appear in the guise of legal problems. Prof. John R. Commons is therefore justified in characterizing the Supreme Court of the United States as the authoritative faculty of economics. The foundation for its economic encyclicals is the Constitution. Plainly, however, constitutional provisions are not economic dogmas and certainly not obsolete economic dogmas. A classic admonition of Mr. Justice Holmes cannot be recalled too often—"A constitution is not intended to embody a particular economic theory, whether of paternalism and the organic relation of the citizen to the State or of laissez faire. It is made for people of fundamentally differing views, and the accident of our finding certain opinions natural and familiar or novel and even shocking ought not to conclude our judgment upon the question whether statutes embodying them conflict with the Constitution of the United States."

By its very conception the Constitution has ample resources within itself to meet the changing needs of successive generations. For "it was made for an undefined and expanding future and for a people gathered and to be gathered from many nations and of many tongues." Through the generality of its language the Constitution provided for the future partly by not forecasting it. If the Court, aided by the bar, has access to the facts and heeds them, the Constitution is flexible enough to respond to the demands of modern society.

And so American constitutional law is not a fixed body of truth but a mode of social adjustment. Indeed, the Constitution owes its continuity to an uninterrupted process of change. "The Constitution cannot make itself; somebody made it, not at once but at several times. It is alterable; and by that draweth nearer to perfection; and without suiting itself to differing times and circumstances it could not live. Its life is prolonged by changing seasonably the several parts of it at several times." So wrote the shrewd Lord Halifax, and his words are as true of our written Constitution as of that strange medley of imponderables, the British Constitution. A ready sense of the need for alteration is perhaps the most precious talent required of the Supreme Court. Upon it depends the vitality of our Constitution as a vehicle for life.

Public law is thus a most potent instrument of public policy. The significant cases before the Supreme Court are not just controversies between two litigants. They involve large public issues, and the general outlook of the Justices gives direction to their judicial views. In law also, where one ends, depends much on one's starting point.

The Supreme Court's right and wrong are drawn most frequently from broad and undefined clauses of the Constitution. A few simple-seeming terms like "liberty" and "property", indeterminate phrases like "regulate commerce * * * among the several States" and "without due process of law" are invoked in judgment upon the shifting circumstances of a dynamic society. Phrases like "due process of law" are of "convenient vagueness". Necessarily their content is derived from without, not revealed within the Constitution. The gloss that is put upon them controls the Nation's efforts to meet its tasks. The capacity of States to control or mitigate unemployment, to assure a living wage for the workers, to clear slums and provide decent housing, to make city planning effective, to distribute fairly the burdens of taxation—these and like functions of modern government hinge on the Supreme Court's reading of the due-process clause. The various attempts in the past to subject great economic instrumentalities to social responsibility—the Stockyards Act, the Grain Futures Act, the Transportation Act, the child labor law—depended upon what the lawyers call interpretation of the commerce clause. But what is interpreted depends on who interprets. The fate of such laws turned on facts and assumptions which underlie the social valuations of the Judges. Again, the thorny controversies affecting business combinations and trade unions are also described as interpretations of the Sherman law and the Clayton Acts. But the results were determined by the Court's view of our industrial scene. So also the opinions of the Justices regarding the activities of trade associations and cooperatives vary with the general context in which different Justices place the economic data deemed relevant to judgment. The sharp conflicts to which control of the railroads and other public utilities gives rise derive not from variant readings of the same English text. They are nurtured in different economic cultures; they are the concrete expressions of different social philosophies.

The Justices of the Supreme Court are arbiters of social policy because their duties make them so. For the words of the Constitution which invoke the legal judgment are usually so unrestrained by their intrinsic meaning or by their history or by prior decisions that they lead the individual Justice free, if indeed they do not compel him, to gather meaning not from reading the Constitution but from reading life. Only an alert and self-critical awareness of the true nature of the judicial process in these public controversies will avert the translation of discredited assumption or unconscious bias into national policy.

In a period of rapid change like ours, the pace of social adjustments must be quickened. Poignant experience has made us realize the public implications of interests heretofore treated as private. Such interests must be stripped of many of their past immunities and subjected to appropriate responsibility. Courts will thus be called upon to make and to sustain extensive readjustments.

For example, the law must become more sophisticated in its conception of trustees' obligations. It must sharpen and extend the duties incident to the fiduciary relations of corporate directors and officers. The whole process of corporate salaries disproportionate to services rendered must be fearlessly faced, but especially the abuse of agreement for swollen contingent compensation. The Bethlehem Steel bonus system is a notorious example. Another instance, recently before the courts, merits recital. The directors of the American Tobacco Co. in 1912 initiated a bylaw authorizing six senior officers to divide among themselves 10 percent of any annual profits in excess of those earned by the company in 1910. Since 1921, $10,000,000 has been thus distributed. In addition to his regular salary of $168,000 and "special cash credits" of $273,000, the president of the company in 1930 received a bonus of $840,000. Even these rewards, apparently, did not provide sufficient incentive. The directors therefore adopted an employee stock-subscription plan, which resulted in the sale to themselves, as officers-employees, of 32,000 shares of stock at $25 a share when the market price was $112. The millions which the president and vice president of the American Tobacco Co. thus received appeared to a majority of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, in New York, only reasonable compensation for making Lucky Strike the most popular cigarette in the world. That court seemed impressed by the fact that both schemes were approved by the stockholders. To which Judge Thomas W. Swan, with real insight into the actualities of corporate management, suggested, in his dissent, that the shareholders when they adopted the bylaw in 1912 could hardly have anticipated that they were conferring upon their president in 1930 a bonus five times his salary, or that through the employee stock-subscription plan three fifths of the stock would be allotted to directors by themselves. Equally unreal seems the court's failure to explore whether the conventional assent by proxies really signifies considered approval.

An effort to secure a reversal of this decision in the Supreme Court unfortunately failed. On technical considerations which cannot here be canvassed, that Court (Mr. Justice Roberts not sitting) invoked a doctrine of convenience against consideration of the case by the Federal courts, and left the matter to the New Jersey courts because the American Tobacco Co. was organized under New Jersey law. Against this disposition three of the Justices—Brandeis, Stone, and Cardozo—protested. They found that "a breach of the fiduciary duties of the directors is a legitimate inference from the allegations", and therefore they could not agree that a "proper exercise of discretion" required them "to deny to the petitioner the relief to which he is so clearly entitled." Mr. Justice Stone admirably expressed the far-reaching objections to the considerations of parochialism to which the Supreme Court, most surprisingly in the light of precedents, deferred in this case: "Extension of corporate activities, distribution of corporate personnel, stockholders, and directors through many States, and the diffusion of corporate ownership, separated from corporate management, make the integrity of the conduct of large business corporations increasingly a matter of national rather than local concern, * * * to which the Federal courts should be quick to respond, when their jurisdiction is rightly invoked."

The case furnishes an illuminating glimpse into the traditional operations of big business and its opportunities for socially indefensible profit to the insiders. On February 10, 1933, the president of the American Tobacco Co. announced that he had "decided to decline the allotment" of 13,440 shares made him in 1931. The law cannot long continue to give such unbridled rein to the acquisitive motive. Our social health cannot afford it.

Disastrous defects have been exposed in our financial institutions; tighter controls must be devised. Secretary Mills calls for degislation that will "remedy the fundamental weakness of our banking structure." Schemes have been adumbrated for a unified national banking system which raise intricate questions of policy and administration as well as of constitutionality. All these will call for judicial understanding of banking and finance, their relation to government and industry and agriculture. But surely legislation and courts must also address themselves to the disclosed tendency of banks to confound three functions which ought to be kept fastidiously segregated:

1. Savings banks. It is the obligation of the savings bank to take practically no risk. Safety is the prime objective.

2. Commercial banking. The financial needs of merchants and manufacturers make it necessary to take business risks. Banks should not avoid these risks, but should know whom to trust and when.

3. Security banking—the buying and selling of securities. This involves not only knowledge of fundamental merits but also knowledge of markets, of social and political movements and the like.

By combining these three functions our banking men have not only dulled and confused their banking wits, they have sometimes also confused the funds of the three departments of banking and thereby disregarded trust obligations. The Glass bill in part addresses itself to some of these abuses. The development and enforcement of effective legal standards for the promotion of sound banking require insight into financial facts, a sympathetic understanding of legislative proposals and the application of exigent public policy, all too frequently forgotten.

Cutting across all our problems are the manifold aspects of taxation. The enormous increase in the cost of society and the subtle forms which modern wealth so largely takes are putting public finance to its severest test. To balance budgets, to pay for the cost of progressively civilized social standards, to safeguard the future, and to divide these burdens with substantial fairness to the different interests in the community—these endeavors present problems more gruelling than were ever faced by Colbert or Hamilton. Financial statesmanship must constantly explore new sources of revenue and find means to prevent the circumvention of their discovery. Such a task is bound to fail without wide latitude for experimentation, within the most promising areas of trial, in devising and executing fiscal measures. No finicky limitation upon the discretion of those charged with the duty of providing revenue, nor jejune conceptions about formal equality should circumscribe the necessarily empirical process of tapping new revenue or stopping new devices for its evasion. The fiscal difficulties of government at best are hard and thorny. They ought not to be made insuperable by reading into the Constitution private notions of social policy. Too often talk about scientific taxation is only a verbal screen for distributing the incidence of taxation according to traditional notions. Judgments of fairness in taxation, as in other activities of government, are functions of their time. Governing ideas of taxation of the eighteenth century, or even of the nineteenth century, were not permanently frozen into the Constitution.

Indeed, we must recognize the profound shift in the very purposes of taxation. Senator Root once reminded the American bar that "the vast increase of wealth resulting from the increased power of production is still in the first stages of the inevitable processes of distribution." Mr. Root was himself a member of an administration which employed the taxing power as one of the instruments for such distribution. Theodore Roosevelt was the first President avowedly to use the taxing power as a direct agency of social policy. More and more it is bound to serve as a powerful means for directing the modern flow of wealth to social uses. The historical ambitions of American democracy and fiscal necessities alike demand it.

"The true principle of a free and popular government would seem to be so to construct it as to give to all, or at least to a very great majority, an interest in its preservation; to found it, as other things are founded, on men's interest. * * * The freest government, if it could exist, would not be long acceptable if the tendency of the laws were to create a rapid accumulation of property in few hands and to render the great mass of the population dependent and penniless. * * * Universal suffrage, for example, could not long exist in a community where there was great inequality of property." So wrote Daniel Webster in his famous oration celebrating the bicentennial of the Pilgrims' landing. A hundred years later, "great inequality of property" is characteristic of our national economy. Perhaps its most devastating consequence is the permeation of American life with material preoccupations. Even a President of the United States could say that the business of America is business, without realizing that he was uttering words of condemnation. The Federal statistics of income dryly tell the tale only in part, as figures do. For a representative year before the depression, out of 6,787,481 who filed income-tax returns 5,003,155 reported incomes below $3,000, and 6,193,270 incomes below $5,000; while 4,031 had incomes above $100,000, 1,860 had above $150,000, 537 above $300,000, 228 above $500,000, and 67 above $1,000,000 a year. Beneath such quiet figures lie, perhaps, the most pulsating problems of American society.

The law's concern with taxation covers a very wide front, and it must extensively modify its precedents and its predispositions. Much new legislation is indispensable; effective investigation must precede legislation; sympathetic judicial insight will have to support the legislation. Leaks must be stopped; skillful avoidances and evasions must be circumvented. In part, this will involve a correction of detail, a reversal of rulings and decisions both of the taxing agencies and of the courts. More drastic changes will also be required. Professional skill and imagination, if directed to increase of revenue and not to protection of heavy taxpayers, will be able to overcome strained interpretations of the Supreme Court and to limit the baneful effects of some of its holdings of unconstitutionality. Thereby, without a doubt, vast sums will be reached which have been withdrawn from their fair share of taxation.

These are only a few of the new paths to be explored if we are to work ourselves out of the morass. Lawyers have a special responsibility in breaking these new paths and allowing free travel upon them. In this country theirs is probably the greatest power for good or evil. High technical competence is, of course, demanded in formulating the complicated adjustments necessary for our complicated society. But technical power can thwart as well as promote necessary social invention. The times demand new methods adapted to new problems, the removal of what is obstructive and wasteful in old principles or old applications.

The Supreme Court is indispensable to the effective workings of our Federal Government. If it did not exist, we should have to create it. I know of no other peaceful method for making the adjustments necessary to a society like ours—for maintaining the equilibrium between State and Federal power, for settling the eternal conflicts between liberty and authority—than through a court of great traditions free from the tensions and temptations of party strife, detached from the fleeting interests of the moment. But because, inextricably, the Supreme Court is also an organ of statesmanship and the most powerful organ, it must have a seasoned understanding of affairs, the imagination to see the organic relations of society, above all, the humility not to set up its own judgment against the conscientious efforts of those whose primary duty it is to govern. So wise and temperate a scholar as the late Ernst Freund expressed this judgment after a lifetime's study of our Government: "It is unlikely that a legislature will otherwise than through inadvertence violate the most obvious and cardinal dictates of justice; gross miscarriages of justice are probably less frequent in legislation than they are in the judicial determination of controversies." And the Supreme Court itself has told us that "it must be remembered that legislatures are ultimate guardians of the liberties and welfare of the people in quite as great a degree as the courts."

Unfortunately the Supreme Court forgets at times to remember its own wisdom. In view of the tasks in hand, the price of judicial obscurantism is too great. Let me give two or three instances reflecting controversies neither minor in character nor resurrected from the dim past but dealing with the liveliest issues of our day.

The reorganization of the St. Paul has implications far beyond the receivership even of an important railroad. In one form or another, whether through administrative action or legislation or voluntary arrangement or a combination of these, we must contract the capital structures, certainly of some of the railroads. This process will entail the interplay of financial and moral considerations and will demand the best thought of our regulatory agencies. The recent decision of the Supreme Court in the St. Paul case thus affects railroad credit, the financial burdens incident to railroad consolidation, the effective powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission to protect the public interest, and, not least, the standards of fiduciary obligation of investment bankers.

According to Mr. Justice Stone, the question before the Supreme Court was "whether the salutary provisions" of the Interstate Commerce Act can be avoided. Can "an issue of securities to defray excessive reorganization expenses" be withdrawn from the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission? The majority of the Court decided that by astuteness in the drafting of documents the bankers' lawyers had deprived the Commission of power to enforce necessary public safeguards. As a result the reorganization managers of the St. Paul secured for themselves over a million dollars and half a dozen New York law firms an amount estimated by one of the managers to be between two thirds of a million and a million.

The minority opinion, representing the views of Justices Stone, Holmes, and Brandeis, characterizes the methods by which the bankers and lawyers were able to get these fees without Commission regulation as a "failure to conform to those elementary standards of fairness and good conscience which equity may always demand." The St. Paul reorganization plan was placed before the Commission in order to obtain its approval of the securities to be issued. A majority of the Commission granted approval, but subject to the condition that testimony be taken as to the fairness of the fees and subject to such order as the Commission might make on that point. As appears from Mr. Justice Stone's statement of the facts, neither the bankers nor their lawyers disclosed an intention to take advantage of the Commission's approval in order later to deny the validity of the conditions attached to such permission.

The formal party in these proceedings was the reorganized company, which the bankers "created and controlled." They caused it to go before the Federal district court which had charge of the receivership and which had ruled that the properties could not be transferred to the new company until the reorganization securities were approved by the Commission. The bankers caused the new company to display the Commission's order to the court, but withheld their plan "to repudiate the condition upon which the order was founded." After the reorganization was thus consummated and nothing remained but settlement of the fees, the new company applied to the Federal courts for immunity against the Interstate Commerce Commission's interference with private arrangement for such fees. The lower court said that the prior moves in the game constituted "a representation" that the new company "had accepted the order and expected to comply with the condition." This was the view adopted by the minority members of the Supreme Court.

But the majority held that the Commission did not have jurisdiction, since the fees were fixed by a "contract between private persons to which the carrier was not a party." Therefore it was treated as though it were merely a contract between the reorganization managers, the committees, and the stockholders. Mr. Justice Stone and his colleagues felt that these were "technical distinctions" which "ought not to affect the authority of the Commission." He dealt with realities. "No one", he wrote, "familiar with the financial and corporate history of this country could say, I think, that railroad credit and the marketability of railroad securities have not been profoundly affected for long periods of time, if not continuously, by the numerous railroad reorganizations, in the course of which junior security holders have found it impossible to save more than a remnant of their investments, and that only by the assumption of a heavy burden of expense, too often the result of wasteful and extravagant methods of reorganization."

Proposed railroad consolidations will involve issues similar to those in the St. Paul case. For instance, among the men who will guide the eastern roads in these consolidations are lawyers and bankers who successfully denied that the Interstate Commerce Commission had jurisdiction over their St. Paul fees. Those fees will probably appear petty in amount when compared with the bankers' and lawyers' charges for consolidating the eastern roads. If these should prove to be excessive, the losers will be the railroads, and thus the investors and the public. If the Interstate Commerce Commission attempts to determine whether the charges are reasonable or not, its authority to do so may again be put in question. These methods for avoiding control may also be employed in other phases of railroad affairs. In the past the public has relied on the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate the railroads in the public interest. That feeling of security is disturbed by the St. Paul decision.

Foreigners are fond of calling this the land of paradoxes. Our public finances certainly justify that characterization. The richest country in the world has been the most dilatory in balancing its Budget and appears the most distracted and embarrassed in its accomplishment. I venture to believe that a major explanation is the systematically inculcated hostility to the taxation of wealth. For a decade the press has sedulously repeated the Mellon doctrine that the immunity of the rich from taxation is a blessing for the poor. In times of prosperity taxes on bloated incomes will discourage enterprise; in days of adversity there are no bloated incomes—such was the governing philosophy.

It ought not to be too surprising that this deep-seated sentiment against the taxation of wealth should be shared by members of our Supreme Court. How easily private notions of economic or social policy are transmuted into constitutional dogma is amply proved by the United States reports since the war. Enormous wealth has been withdrawn from the taxing power of the Nation and the States on the gossamer claim that otherwise governmental instrumentalities would be defeated. The history of taxation is, to no small extent, a battle of wits between skill in devising taxes and astuteness in evading them. By creating constitutional obstructions to safeguards against evasion, the Supreme Court has put the Constitution at the disposal of the evaders. A few years ago the Supreme Court sheltered great wealth by interposing the benevolent "due process" clause on behalf of rich donors who made gifts in anticipation of tax measures especially designed for them. One might suppose the Supreme Court would at least be friendly to the effective enforcement of the inheritance tax. The social justification of that tax has become an accepted postulate even of our individualistic society. But the other day the Court, again under the blessed versatility of "due process", nullified the attempt of Congress, in response to the compelling experience of the Treasury Department, to prevent gross evasions of the inheritance tax.

From the original enactment of the estate tax law in 1916, it was realized that a single tax on estates could be too easily avoided by well-timed and astute disposition of property before death. To check such practices the act of 1916 contained two safeguards. Gifts made "in contemplation of death", and those in which the donor retained a joint interest during his lifetime, were taxed as part of his estate at death. But other means remained by which property might be withdrawn from the operation of the tax and yet remain within the effective control of the donor; he might, for example, place it in trust with a power of revocation or control reserved in himself. The possibility of escape by this device was materially reduced by legislation, which taxed gifts, by way of trust, taking effect "in possession or enjoyment" at the time of the donor's death. The courts threatened the effectiveness of much of this legislation by technical and sterile definitions of "possession or enjoyment", and in 1931 Congress was forced to close a broad avenue of escape from the estate tax by making specific provision for the inclusion of property which is transferred on trust for another but from which the income is reserved for the donor during his life.

Meanwhile the tax authorities were beset by difficulties growing out of the vague phrase, "in contemplation of death." In what degree the donor must have apprehended his end, and how to prove that apprehension, were questions which made the collection of a tax precarious at best. The devil himself, the lawyers are fond of quoting, knoweth not the mind of man; and even if he did the devil's advocate might experience considerable difficulty in proving it to a court of law. Realizing that the limited omniscience of the taxing authorities was finding it impossible to isolate successfully those gifts that were made "in contemplation of death", Congress in 1924 imposed a tax on all gifts, irrespective of date or motive, at rates equal to those under the estate tax. This general gift tax was upheld by the Supreme Court. In addition, the tax on gifts made in contemplation of death was retained, giving the Government a second string to its bow, although, of course, credit was allowed where a gift tax had already been paid on the transfer.

The arm of the Government was strengthened, moreover, by requiring the representatives of the estate to prove, where the gift was within 2 years of death, that it was not in contemplation thereof. But this shift of the burden of proof was of little value to the Government in a contest against an elderly man of wealth contemplating death with one eye and the tax law with the other. The gift tax itself promised better results, but in 1926 it was repealed. (By the Revenue Act of 1932 it has been restored.)

Congress was alive to the need of conserving the gain which the gift tax had made in the enforcement of the estate tax. Ten years' experience in administering the revenue acts had taught its lesson. Congress provided that gifts made within 2 years of death should be "deemed to have been made in contemplation of death", and so might be assessed under the estate tax. "The inclusion of this provision", reported the Ways and Means Committee of the House, "will prevent most of the evasion and is the only way in which it can be prevented." This is the provision which the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional. Again "due process" worked its charm on behalf of wealth.

In thus setting at naught the considered effort of Congress to obtain a really effective tax on decedents' estates a majority of the Court found the provision arbitrary and unreasonable, because it might apply to gifts made with no thought of death or taxes. "The young man in abounding health", writes Mr. Justice Sutherland, "bereft of life by a stroke of lightning within 2 years after making a gift, is conclusively presumed to have acted under the inducement of the thought of death, equally with the old and ailing who already stands in the shadow of the inevitable." The pity aroused by this affecting apparition of the benevolent young plutocrat is somewhat mollified by the fact that if the property had not been given to kith and kin—gifts to charity being exempted—so shortly before the donor's end it would in all likelihood have passed by will and been taxed accordingly.

The apparition fades completely before the picture drawn by Mr. Justice Stone in a dissenting opinion, in which he was joined by Mr. Justice Brandeis. (Mr. Justice Cardozo did not sit in the case.) This opinion reveals graphically by whom these gifts are made and with what effect on the operation of the taxing system. Mr. Justice Stone analyzes 102 cases in which the Government and the decedent's estate engaged in litigation over the question whether a gift had been made "in contemplation of death" under the law as it existed before the 1926 provision. He writes:

"In 20 cases, involving gifts of approximately $4,250,000, the Government was successful; in 3 it was partially successful; and in 78, involving gifts largely in excess of $120,000,000, it was unsuccessful. In another the jury disagreed. In 56 of the total of 78 cases decided against the Government, the gifts were made within 2 years of death. In this group of 56 donors, 2 were more than 90 years of age at the time of death; 10 were between 80 and 90; 27 were between 70 and 80; 6 were between 60 and 70; 6 were between 50 and 60; and only 1 was younger than 50. There was 1 gift of $46,000,000 made within 2 months of death by a donor 71 years of age at death; 1 of $36,790,000 made by a donor over 80, who consulted a tax expert before making the gift; 1 of over $10,400,000 made by a donor aged 76, 6 months before death; and 1 by a donor aged 75 at death, in which the tax assessed was over $1,000,000. There was 1 other in excess of $2,000,000, 5 others largely in excess of $1,000,000, 4 others in excess of $500,000, 13 in excess of $250,000, and 14 in excess of $100,000. The value of the gifts was not shown definitely in 3 cases; 12 involved gifts totaling less than $100,000. In the remaining 22 cases the gifts were made more than 2 years before the death of the donor."

This decision does not touch technical issues that are in the special province of learned judges. How taxes are evaded and how fine a net must be woven to keep big fish from escaping, what the experience of a decade of Federal estates administration indicated, and what means are adapted to prevent wholesale evasion—these are matters which tax administrators, members of the Ways and Means Committee, students of public finance, are as competent to understand as Mr. Justice Sutherland and his brethren. Is it not the plain truth that Mr. Justice Stone's powerful opinion deals with actualities and demolishes the hollow fabric of unreality erected by the majority? And if it be the truth, the Supreme Court has its duty toward a balanced Budget—it ought not to sanctify gross tax evasion or call the word spinning by which it does so, the Constitution.

Finally, what of the Supreme Court's attitude toward the most inclusive of all our problems, namely, how to subdue our anarchic competitive economy to reason, how to correct the disharmonies between production and consumption? This issue was raised last spring in the now famous Oklahoma Ice case. On the basis of watchful scrutiny of the actual operation of the ice industry in Oklahoma, the legislature of that State, acting upon the recommendation of its corporation commission, availed itself of a well-tested instrument of public control—the device of a certificate of public convenience and necessity—to subject the ice business to a regulated instead of a wildcat economy. By this means Oklahoma, within the limited area of the ice industry, endeavored to avoid excessive equipment and the demoralization of deflation and unemployment, and thereby promote stability. But the majority of the Court struck down this very modest essay in regulated economy. It denied Oklahoma's right to act upon its own experience, and, for a time, at least, unbridled competition was given the sanction of the United States Constitution.

Against such an attitude, Mr. Justice Brandeis raised his magistral voice. It is not hazardous prophecy to believe that Mr. Justice Brandeis' opinion (concurred in by Mr. Justice Stone, Mr. Justice Cardozo taking no part in the decision) merely anticipates history, even the history of future opinions of the Court. The closing observations of this memorable dissent deserve quotation:

"To stay experimentation in things social and economic is a grave responsibility. Denial of the right to experiment may be fraught with serious consequences to the Nation. It is one of the happy incidents of the Federal system that a single courageous State may, if its citizens choose, serve as a laboratory and try novel social and economic experiments without risk to the rest of the country. This Court has the power to prevent an experiment. We may strike down the statute which embodies it on the ground that, in our opinion, the measure is arbitrary, capricious, or unreasonable. We have power to do this, because the due process clause has been held by the Court applicable to matters of substantive law as well as to matters of procedure. But in the exercise of this high power, we must be ever on our guard, lest we erect our prejudices into legal principles. If we would guide by the light of reason, we must let our minds be bold."

The faith and enterprise which built this Nation are unimpaired. Our intrinsic resources are greater than ever. We have also the unparalleled advantage of a fluid society. Under the guidance of a Supreme Court responsive to the potentialities of the Constitution to meet the needs of our society, it would now lie within our power to have an enduring diffusion of the goods of civilization to an extent never before attainable.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE—ADDRESS BY FORMER SENATOR HAWES

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, at the last session Congress passed an act which it was believed would finally dispose of the question of Philippine independence. It is interesting to note, however, that since the passage of that act the old forces of imperialism are gathering strength to oppose the adoption and approval of that act by the Philippine Legislature. On Saturday last former Senator Harry B. Hawes, of Missouri, one of the coauthors of the Philippine Independence Act, delivered an address at the Thirty-seventh Annual Meeting of the American Academy of Political and Social Science in Philadelphia, in which he set out the developments of the situation since the passage of the Philippine Independence Act by the last Congress. Believing that this speech presents a matter of most vital importance to the Congress, I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the body of the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

There being no objection, the address was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

After 35 years of American tutelage, the Philippine people have received from the Government of the United States a tender of complete independence, of separate, sovereign nationhood. That tender has come to them in the form of an act of Congress passed on January 17 last, and as the result of long study of the present factors and the future possibilities involved in the establishment of a new nation in the Far East.

This grant of independence to the Filipinos fulfills the policy of the United States formulated in the course of the last generation. As the formulation of that policy was the joint enterprise of Republican and Democratic administrations and free from partisanship, so also its consummation has come through the efforts of all the several political groups represented in the recent Congress.

Let me review, as briefly as the need for a clear understanding of the subject will permit, the genesis and development of Philippine-American relationships and reciprocal obligations.

This meeting of your academy is its thirty-seventh. I invite you to recall certain events almost coincident with your second meeting, in 1898. At that time Spain still possessed, as the richest part of her colonial domain, the fertile islands of Cuba and Puerto Rico, adjacent to our eastern seaboard, and the seven thousand-odd islands of the Philippine Archipelago, lying near the confines of Asia, some 7,000 miles to the westward of our Pacific coast. Of Cuba we knew a good deal, of Puerto Rico much less, of the Philippines almost nothing. The Spanish-American War brought the Philippines not only within our knowledge but also within our national household.

Doubtless the delegates to your third and fourth annual meetings—those of 1899 and 1900—deliberated and debated whether we should retain or release the Philippines, for they had by that time become a political problem of considerable magnitude. One has only to read the proceedings of Congress during those years to perceive what a serious question our conquest of the Philippines had injected into our national forum. The discussion became a controversy, causing cleavages not only between but even within the two major parties.

AMERICA'S PHILIPPINE POLICY

The Filipino insurgents under Aguinaldo had aided our Army to take Manila, the capital and stronghold of Spanish power in the islands. Their services were remembered by millions of Americans who, for that reason, were unwilling that the Filipino belligerents against Spain's imperialism should again be subjected to her rule. However, not many believed that the Philippines were then prepared politically or economically to maintain a government of their own. On the other hand, the islands could not be ceded to England or Japan or France or any other power. There remained only one other course. That was for the United States to take temporary possession of the Philippines and prepare its people for independence. I pause to remark that this provisional tenure of the islands supplies the only explanation why the government of the Philippines was then placed and has since remained under the jurisdiction of the War Department. But not even this fact should justify this anomalous arrangement.

This vesting of the War Department with a share in the administration of the civil affairs of any part or possession of the United States in time of peace is a contravention of American principles calling for abandonment. A bill to transfer to another department the authority now exercised by the War Department was introduced in the last Congress by Senator Bingham, Republican, of Connecticut, but it was not enacted. I am informed that Senator TYDINGS, Democrat, of Maryland, is preparing to present a similar bill in the current Congress. The law recently enacted to give the President power to reorganize or to discontinue Federal departments and bureaus might be invoked to accomplish this necessary reform in respect to the Philippines.

We find that beginning with McKinley and continuing to the present the Presidents of the United States have, all of them, contemplated the ultimate establishment of an independent Philippines having a republican form of government. This contemplation was but a reflex of public opinion, which found expression not only through the mouths of Presidents but also in declarations of Congress. So much had this become a policy and objective of the American people that by 1916 Congress found it proper and pertinent to proclaim (in the preamble of the Jones Act) that:

"It was never the intention of the people of the United States, in the incipiency of the War with Spain, to make it a war of conquest or for territorial aggrandizement, and it has always been the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government could be established therein."

I am not asking you to believe that there was no dissent from this policy and program. I record with regret that notwithstanding its consonance with the principles of the American Government and its response to the wishes of the great majority of Americans there were nevertheless those—and there are still many—who demanded and now demand the retention of the Philippines. Some of these advocates of keeping the islands in contradiction of our doctrines and our promises are a little timid about voicing their true thoughts. They prefer to defeat American plans and Philippine hopes by resort to devious methods. They talk of commercial opportunities in the Far East, of American prestige in the Orient, of the danger of Japanese conquest of the Philippines after our withdrawal, of Filipino incompetence to manage an independent state, but their meaning is that they want the United States to perpetuate its sovereignty in the islands and to continue a policy that negatives every American tradition and breaks the faith we have plighted to the Filipino nation.

In this sorry enterprise Americans in the United States are abetted by Americans in the Philippines. Though only a handful—there are but 6,000 of them—the latter are most persistent—I had almost said pernicious. They disparage every design of extending self-government to the Filipino people. They inspire all manner of propaganda for circulation in the United States. They are not to be moved by President Wilson's certification to the fitness of the Filipinos for self-government, when he said:

"Allow me to call your attention to the fact that the people of the Philippine Islands have succeeded in maintaining a stable government since the last act of Congress in their behalf."

They seem equally heedless of the attitude of President Theodore Roosevelt, whose words I quote:

"Apparently its (the Wilson administration's) course in the Philippines has proceeded upon the theory that the Filipinos are now fit to govern themselves. Whatever may be our personal and individual beliefs in this matter, we ought not, as a nation, to break faith or even to seem to break faith."

There is ample warrant for the belief that but for the World War and its aftermath, the second administration of President Wilson would have hastened the solution of the Philippine problem, and that by giving the islands independence. President Wilson had counseled, even urged, the liquidation of America's obligations in the Philippines, and one of his last official recommendations to Congress was in that behalf.

ECONOMIC FACTORS AT WORK

Economic conditions in the United States during the last 3 years helped to direct the attention of the American people to the Philippine problem. American agriculture, laboring under stress, manifested a growing insistence to be relieved of competition from Philippine products entering the United States free of duty. American labor also was concerned about unrestricted immigration from the islands. The spokesmen of these groups appeared before the committees of Congress to press their demands. All of these witnesses testified to the detriment which uncertainty and undecisiveness as to the islands was causing to Philippine as well as American interests, and all of them pleaded for some action that promised finality. This situation furnished an interest of national practical significance which the movement for Philippine independence had previously lacked to bring it to an issue.

Beginning on January 15, 1930, the Senate's Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs conducted exhaustive hearings for several weeks—that is, until March 10, 1930. The testimony presented to this committee constitutes a volume of 656 printed pages. Almost concurrently—on January 16, 1930—the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization initiated hearings on a phase of the Philippine problem and took voluminous testimony. In 1932 the Senate committee resumed its inquiries, as did the House committee. Subsequently the facts they gathered were published jointly, filling many hundreds of pages. As a result of their investigation, these committees submitted to their respective branches of Congress reports and recommendations which were almost identical in acknowledging the obligation of the United States to grant independence to the Philippines and similar in respect to the process by which they proposed to discharge the obligation. The only real difference between them concerned the time for independence. The House bill provided a transition period of 8 years, while the Senate bill provided a period of 15 years.

CONGRESS UNDERSTOOD PROBLEM

It has been said by many editors and other critics of the Philippine Independence Act that it had little, or at least insufficient, study or understanding by Congress. I have referred to the work of the several committees to show that this criticism lacks justification. Let me add that the records will show that no subject before Congress in recent years has been more fully considered than Philippine independence. Besides the reports of the committees and the testimony given at the various hearings, Members of Congress had the benefit not only of addresses by Senators and Representatives but also by authorities on the subject outside of Congress.

Congress did not, then, act without study and understanding. Its members were fully informed; and precisely because they had full information, they voted with virtual unanimity in favor of independence. The Senate and House committees by practically unanimous action reported bills to their respective branches.

The House of Representatives passed the bill on April 4, 1932, by a vote of 306 to 47. There was no roll call on the bill in the Senate when it passed that body on December 17, 1932. When the bill was again submitted to a vote in the House on January 13, 1933, following President Hoover's veto, it received 274 votes. Only 94 were cast to sustain the veto. In the Senate the veto was overridden by a vote of 66 to 26 on January 17, 1933.

Both in the House and Senate some of the few votes against the bill were cast solely upon the ground of party loyalty to the President, not by reason of intellectual conviction. This was quite apparent.

CHOICE OF ROADS TO SOLUTION

In determining and deciding the permanent status of the Philippines, Congress had the choice of 1 of 4 courses. First, it might have granted immediate independence, to be accompanied by exclusion of Filipino immigrants and the taxing of Philippine imports to the United States. Second, it might have decreed the retention of the islands and devised and established a strictly colonial form of government for them. Third, it might have incorporated them as one or more States into the American Union. Fourth, it was free to do what it has done—after weighing all the reasons for and against the adoption of the other three courses—grant independence after a period sufficiently long to allow for the gradual adjustment of the economic relations between the islands and the United States.

THE AMERICAN OFFER

It is now in order to examine the terms and conditions of the tender of independence the United States has made to the Philippine people and to consider the aims and exigencies which dictated the provisions of the independence act.

First, the act gives them almost at once a very large increase of their present autonomy—virtually complete self-government. They are to elect their own executives, legislators, and judges, levy and collect taxes, and in general order their affairs in their own way, subject to certain powers of government reserved by the United States to safeguard its sovereignty and responsibility. The Commonwealth of the Philippines to be created by this act, if and when the Filipino people ratify the new constitution, will have as large powers and authority as those of any of our own States. Its relationship and its allegiance to the United States during the intermediate period will correspond rather to those Canada bears to Great Britain than to those a State of the Union bears to the Federal Government. In short, this Commonwealth of the Philippines will be a semisovereign and semi-independent republic.

Second. Ten years after the acceptance of the act by the people of the islands the United States shall recognize and proclaim the independence of the Commonwealth of the Philippines and completely withdraw its sovereignty. With almost 50 years of preparation for self-rule, it should be a worthy addition to the democracies of the world.

DECISION RESTS WITH FILIPINOS

Upon the Filipino people now rests the responsibility of deciding whether or not they shall have independence on the terms of the act. Their decision should be their own voluntary expression, uninfluenced by pressure of any kind from us. One of the most crucial and convincing tests of their fitness for complete independence will be the exercise of this option to determine their destiny. Never before in the history of humankind has a subject people had at once the opportunity and the full freedom to elect whether they should continue under the rule of another race and nation or choose their own way of life.

If the Filipinos make the choice of independence, fully understanding its responsibilities and burdens, they will have proved the sincerity of their 30 years of petitioning for what has at last come to them. If they reject this tender, they should know that, no matter how imperative their reasons may seem to them, their action will be taken in this country to verify the charge that they have never had a genuine longing for free nationhood, but had been making independence a device of domestic politics. That such should be the impression in America might be unfair to the Filipinos and regrettable, but it is well for them to understand in advance just how their rejection of the act will be regarded in the United States. Nor is this all. If the issue of independence were thus eliminated by the rejection of the act, then the dominant moral issue of liberty and independence, which for all these years has shielded them against unjust discrimination and material injury arising from their economic or social relations with the United States, could no longer be raised; and in such case it would not be at all improbable that greater restrictions of trade and immigration than those provided in the act would be imposed upon them by Congress.

We know that in the past certain officials of the War Department and officers of the Army have actively opposed independence. That was true even in the recent past. We are aware also that representatives of certain American financial and industrial interests have put obstacles in the path to independence. They have for years resisted the logic of events. They have originated propaganda with which to mislead the American public and even the editors of American newspapers. By this propaganda they have aroused prejudice among Americans against the Filipino people and inspired resentment among the latter.

I do not dispute the right of these groups to oppose independence heretofore; but to them and to all other Americans, whether in the United States or in the Philippines, I would say that the matter is now settled by the branch of our Government on which the Constitution places the responsibility and the duty of deciding it. A decision having been made, it should command the respect of all Americans.

This act of Congress gives the Filipino people the right to reject or accept it. Our plain duty as Americans is to clarify and explain our tender of independence; to assist them to a full understanding of it, but obviously not to misconstrue and distort its meaning.

FILIPINO OPPOSITION CONSIDERED

According to press dispatches from Manila, those Filipinos who oppose the ratification of the act proffering Philippine independence predicate their opposition on four principal grounds. I summarize their theses as follows:

1. The trade relations which the act establishes pending final withdrawal of American sovereignty are unfair to the Philippines.
2. The reservation of American military and naval bases in the islands is a curtailment of Philippine independence.
3. The powers which the act vests in the President of the United States and the High Commissioner during the period of transition are excessive and destructive of Philippine autonomy.
4. The 10-year period between the establishment of the Commonwealth of the Philippines and the consummation of independence is too long.

SECOND OBJECTION MET

I shall discuss the second of these objections before the others. In the first place, the provision of the act dealing with the question of military and naval reservations in the islands gives the United States an option, but does not impose an obligation to retain its present bases there. Those in charge of the bill had reasons of prudence for including the provision in its present form. It postponed to a date after the independence of the Philippines the American decision as to whether or not the retention of these military and naval bases would be necessary and advisable, avoiding meantime a controversy which might have delayed for many more years or wholly prevented the grant of independence. The final decision as to this matter will be made by Congress, not by the President alone. When the time for decision arrives the Filipinos may be certain that the sense of justice which actuated Congress in promoting their independence will prompt it to deal fairly with Filipino interests in this regard. Even, however, if the United States should elect to keep naval stations in the Philippines after independence, that would be no more an abridgment of their independence than American possession of a naval base at Guantanamo is a limitation of Cuban independence.

On the contrary, the continuance of American sovereignty as to one or more parcels of land in the Philippines would connote the interest of the United States in its political integrity and would enhance its security. I do not say that this was any part of the purpose of the provision, I do not hold that it was intended to commit the United States to a guaranty of Philippine independence once consummated, but it certainly would have that effect. In that event, the Filipino people would benefit, not suffer, as a consequence of it.

Moreover, after independence the Filipinos are free to negotiate for the return of these bases to the Philippine domain if meanwhile they believe that their sovereignty is impaired by the presence of American forces in the islands.

POWERS OF PRESIDENT AND HIGH COMMISSIONER

I come now to the third objection—that the powers given to the President and the High Commissioner are excessive, unwarrantable, and destructive of the autonomy intended by the law. The President, of course, is clothed with certain necessary authority, but is presumed to exercise it only in certain eventualities. He could not, for example, prevent independence; he could not substitute any other plan for that provided in the act.

The High Commissioner has no inherent authority. He is the agent of the President with limited supervision over Philippine finances, including its obligations evidenced by bonds. He reports to the President regarding the maintenance of order and the fulfillment of certain duties and functions required of the government of the Commonwealth, but he has no such power of intermeddling in the ordinary administration of the government, as the Filipino objectors fear. It is fair to presume that the President of the United States and the High Commissioner will act in good faith and in conformity with law. It is arbitrary and tyrannous abuse that the uninformed Filipino critics vision, but there is nothing in the act to justify their forebodings. The powers retained by the United States through the President and the High Commissioner are only those absolutely necessary to safeguard American sovereignty and responsibility during the transition period. They represent the minimum of reserved powers which no government at Washington will ever consent to surrender or reduce.

I consider next the complaint that the period preceding independence is too long. Let no one suppose that this period was fixed at 10 years without concern for the interests of the Filipino people. Indeed, I assert with complete knowledge of the facts that it was precisely regard for the well-being of the Filipinos that controlled in this matter. Congress had before it three proposals as respects the interval between the enactment and the final fruition of independence. One bill contemplated independence in 5 years, another in 8 years, and still another in 15 years. The act now in operation is a compromise of those proposals. The House of Representatives passed the Hare bill with its provision for independence in 8 years. The Hawes-Cutting bill, which the Senate committee recommended, looked to independence in 15 years. Ten years is therefore the mean of the extremes represented by the several bills to which Congress gave serious consideration, and this period was adopted as the minimum which the Filipino people, in their own interest, will need for the adjustment of their economic conditions and their trade relations with other countries in preparation for the changes following independence. It is true that there was a proposal for immediate independence, but it found little support in either branch of Congress.

As an alternative it was urged that immediate independence be granted, followed by an adjustment period of 10 years. This plan was to give the Philippines independence at once, but to permit it to have free access to the American market for 10 years. Both legal and economic objections negatived this scheme. First of all, it would have violated existing treaties of commerce between the United States and other nations. In the second place, such preferential treatment of an independent Philippines, even if it should not contravene our agreements with other countries, would nevertheless have provoked reprisals against our trade with various nations whose markets were in the United States. Moreover, there could be no stability to this special arrangement unless it were made the subject of a treaty between the United States and the Philippines, and of course the latter could not enter into such an engagement until after its independence.

In order to ascertain the mind of Congress when it rejected the proposal for immediate independence and decided in favor of a longer period of transition than 5 years, it is necessary to review the economic conditions in the islands. Members of Congress knew that reciprocal free trade between the Philippines and the United States had subsisted for 25 years. In the course of that time important Philippine industries had been organized and developed on the basis of free commerce with our country. In consequence these industries, particularly the production of sugar, came to be dependent for their success—almost for their existence—on the protection they had in the American market. On the other hand, American goods found protection and preference in the Philippines. The profitable commerce between the islands and the United States stood on a largely artificial footing.

What would happen if this trade between the United States and the Philippines were suddenly and completely terminated by immediate independence? Independence without a preparatory period would mean the imposition of American tariffs on Philippine products which constitute the chief source of its public and private income. It would greatly reduce its trade with America. It would stop forthwith large expenditures of American money in the islands for military and other activities estimated at $13,000,000 a year. It would mean a radical change in the terms upon which Philippine public loans could be contracted. It would mean tremendous damage if not ruin to all of those industries based on the present reciprocal free trade. In addition, there would be a precipitate decrease in Philippine revenues, including some $300,000 collected as internal revenue on Philippine products entering the United States but covered into the insular treasury. The economic shock would be so sudden that it is a matter of conjecture whether the basic economic structure of the Philippines, including the currency system and its government finances, could stand the strain.

With these facts before it, Congress, in justice and fairness to the people of the Philippines, refused to vote immediate independence. Some allowance of time was necessary to give Philippine industries and commerce a fair chance to survive.

FREE-TRADE RELATIONS ESTABLISHED ARE FAIR

Has the Independence Act established Philippine-American trade relations that are unfair to the Filipino people, as a few of their citizens allege? The committees of Congress found only one feasible method of adjusting the Philippines to the economic status which independence will give it. This was, as the act provides, to permit during the transition period the continuance of the present free trade between the islands and the United States but with a limitation of the free exports of certain products to this country. Among these, and the most important of them, is sugar. It is this curtailment of the free sugar that begets most of the criticism of the economic provisions of the act. The charge had been made that the limitations on Philippine sugar were written into the law at the behest and for the advantage of producers elsewhere, and especially those of Cuba. Their pleas were answered, so the allegation goes, and the Filipino people's rights and welfare were ignored. I say, in full cognizance of all the facts and circumstances, that no such sordid motive prevailed. The limitations were fixed not at the instance, but contrary to the wishes and efforts, of Cuban interests which favored immediate independence, or a much smaller quota of Philippine free sugar. As a matter of historic truth, the only interposition by Cuban interests was to oppose, not to further, the passage of the bill. This allegation of Cuban influence in the fixing of the quotas in the bill was invented and is reiterated to shield the purpose of its authors—that is, the prevention of Philippine independence under any conditions, now or hereafter. I only wish I could believe that some of the opponents of the bill in the Philippines are not actuated by a like intent.

Representatives of American agriculture, including producers of beet sugar, demanded that in default of immediate independence, a graduated tariff be at once imposed on Philippine products entering the United States. When it was suggested that instead of immediate independence and immediate imposition of tariffs there be at limit on the amounts of certain products permitted to come to this country free of duty, these spokesmen for American agriculture urged that the limitation on sugar be set at 600,000 tons. President Hoover, during the recent campaign, gave that figure his approval.

Philippine producers, on their side, contended that their production for 1932-33 would exceed 1,000,000 tons and that within the next 3 years it would increase to 1,200,000 tons. They argued that since they had been encouraged by the Government of the United States to develop their industry, the bill should reflect some of the equities involved. Accordingly Congress put the limitation at 850,000 tons, the amount of their imports last year. This was a quarter of a million tons higher than American producers demanded it should be. The reason for the adoption of this figure—850,000 tons—as the basis for the limitation was that it represents the status quo of volume of exports to the United States during the year immediately preceding the enactment of the bill; that is, the year 1932. The United States will impose and collect the full duty on all Philippine imports in excess of this quota. But sugar and other commodities are to come to the United States free of duty and without limitation until the inauguration of the Commonwealth. Upon the inauguration of the Commonwealth the limitations will apply, and after 5 years there will be a progressive application of the tariff to these and other free Philippine exports to the United States, this to take the form of an export tax in the Philippines and rising to 25 percent of the American duty.

Congress believed that under this plan and during the 10 years of transition it will be possible for the Filipino people to accommodate their industries, their finances, their investments, and their social system to the changes that are to accompany and follow independence. They have not only notice of the loss of their free market in the United States; they have also a process for offsetting their loss. They have the opportunity to reorganize their industries and lower their costs of production to meet their competitors on fair terms.

I think that anything like an accurate comprehension of the economic provisions of the act will convince the inquirer that Congress has been fair and just to Philippine interests and has sought to safeguard them from avoidable injury or difficulties when independence shall have come and the islands shall have lost the protection of American tariff.

WILL CONGRESS REOPEN QUESTION?

It is reported that some Filipinos opposed to this act will attempt to persuade Congress to enact a new independence measure or to change the act just passed so as to meet certain objections against the economic and political provisions of the latter. If those promoting this movement will acquaint themselves with American public opinion and the temper of Congress, it is my judgment they will ascertain and admit that the act submitted to their countrymen for acceptance or rejection is the very best that can be obtained from the current Congress or any other in the next 10 years, if ever. They will find, I am persuaded, that, if for no other reason, Congress preoccupied as it is with the gravest problems that have confronted the American people since the Civil War will not consent to reopen the Philippine question, and certainly not within a few months after it has closed the discussion by enacting a bill to which it gave a large share of its time and attention during a period of more than 3 years.

The disposition of Congress to regard the Philippine problem as closed is to be found recorded in the statements of some of its leaders. I think it useful to quote some of them. I begin with Senator TYDINGS (Democrat), of Maryland, chairman of the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs:

"In my judgment," he says, "the Philippine independence bill just passed is as favorable a bill to the Filipinos as can be passed through Congress. I was one of those who tried to keep out of the bill every discrimination against the people of the islands; and having demonstrated my friendship in this fashion for their cause, let me say that it is not only doubtful if another bill as acceptable to them as this one can be passed; if they reject it, it is doubtful if any bill dealing with Philippine independence will again be considered—certainly not for a very long time, because the rejection of this bill by the Filipinos will be construed by the people of the United States as indicating they do not want independence."

Considering that Senator TYDINGS is chairman of the committee which has jurisdiction with respect to legislation for the Philippines, his statement carries great weight.

Representative RALPH F. LOZIER (Democrat), a prominent member of the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House, is of the same belief as Senator TYDINGS.

"If the people of the Philippines reject the proffered independence," he declares, "such action will keenly disappoint millions of Americans in every walk of life who have generously and unselfishly supported the cause of Philippine independence. The recent Enabling Act fulfills our national covenants, manumits 13,000,000 people from the nominal sovereignty of the United States, creates a Philippine republic, and insures its stabilization and entrance into the family of nations under most favorable conditions.

"The inhabitants of the Philippines are standing face to face with destiny, halting at the forks of the road. One road leads to quick, sure, and complete independence. The other road leads back to the problems, the perplexities, and the vicissitudes through which they have struggled for a generation. Which path will your Filipino people travel? Ten years is as nothing in the life of a nation, in its birth and preparation for the duties and responsibilities of the future. If your people have the wisdom, genius, and vision that I believe they possess, they will not reject the proffered independence."

Senator BORAH (Republican), former chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, a very influential figure in that branch of Congress, answering the intimation that the Filipinos may not be willing to accept the material burdens which independence under the terms of this act may entail, declared:

"Unless we are prepared to say to these people, and they are prepared to say to themselves, that they shall take their chances in the competitive conditions which are to arise, we may as well dismiss the question of independence and say to the Filipino people, 'You shall remain a part of the United States. We will no longer discuss the subject.'"

Senator KEY PITTMAN, of Nevada, Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, an able statesman, a sincere friend of the Filipino people, a student of this subject who understands our own and the Philippine economic situation, entertains a like view.

CONGRESS KNEW FILIPINO VIEWPOINT

In its study of the bill granting independence to the Philippines, Congress had the benefit of the Filipino viewpoint, whether that took the form of agreement or opposition to the particulars of the measure. This viewpoint was presented by officials of the Philippine government, delegated by unanimous vote of both branches of the Philippine Legislature, irrespective of parties. It is worth while to recall the names and the official positions of these ambassadors of the Philippine nation.

Manuel Quezon, president of the Philippine Senate, was originally designated as a co-chairman of this Philippine Mission, but feeble health prevented his coming to the United States at that time. Senator Sergio Osmena, acting president of the Philippine Senate, took his place. The other co-chairman was Manuel Roxas, speaker of the Philippine House of Representatives. Their associates were Senator Ruperto Montinola, minority floor leader of the senate; Pedro Sabido, majority floor leader of the house; and Emiliano T. Tirona, minority floor leader of the house. The Resident Commissioners from the Philippines, PEDRO GUEVARA and CAMILO OSIAS, were ex-officio members of the mission.

These agents of the Filipino nation were alert and able champions of their people's rights and aspirations. I do not wish it to be understood that they approved every provision of the independent measure. On the contrary, they vigorously dissented from not a few of its provisions—those of economic as well as political import. They reinforced the merits of their case by ability and eloquence of a high order. Had they been Americans pleading the cause of America as they pleaded the cause of their own people, we should all be proud of them.

If the American Congress should create a commission to negotiate with the people and government of a foreign nation and should for that purpose appoint Vice President GARNER; Senator JOSEPH T. ROBINSON, majority leader; and Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY, minority leader of the Senate; Speaker HENRY T. RAINEY; Representative JOSEPH W. BYRNS, majority leader; and Representative BERTRAND H. SNELL, minority leader of the House, it would do precisely what the Philippine Legislature did when it constituted the Philippine Mission and sent it to the United States to speak for the Filipinos. As any foreign nation would accept an American congressional commission as representing the Government of the United States, so the Philippine Mission was received in this country as fully representing the Filipino people. Both the executive departments and Congress accorded this Philippine Mission official recognition.

PHILIPPINE MISSION UNDERSTOOD DIFFICULTIES

The mission were unable to have all of their recommendations included in the bill. They saw that compromise was inevitable if independence were to be obtained at all. They faced the realities with patriotism and courage. The act as it stands does not meet all their demands, but in view of the circumstances I am sure they realize—and they have stated—that it gives the Philippines independence on the most favorable terms and conditions that were obtainable. They know from their close acquaintance with all the factors at work in this country—the prostration of agriculture, the paralysis of industry, the pressure for domestic legislation to the exclusion of every other claim and interest—that they could not get for years to come, if ever, a better bill than the one enacted. They should be equally aware that Congress will not give hearing or heed to any plea for modification of this Independence Act. They should be convinced that Congress supplied the only feasible and honorable solution.

If Congress had attempted to give all that the Philippines demanded or all that certain American groups and interests sought, the result would have been a stalemate. Concession of all that the Philippines wanted would have worked injustice to the United States. On the other hand, to concede all that Americans claimed would have been to destroy the Philippines. Neither Filipinos alone nor Americans alone, attentive only to their separate interests, could have produced a program satisfactory to both countries. Congress, however, accomplished an equitable reconcilement of the conflicting interests and gave the Filipinos their independence with less cost of disturbance and distress than any of the little nations created since the World War have had to pay for the like boon.

This is not to say that the Filipino people will not experience difficulties and hardships both before and after independence. They may have to reduce expenditures until they can compensate for the losses in foreign trade and in internal revenue. There will be cleavages and conflicts among the people, I doubt not. There may even be some small disturbances of the public order. But I believe the Filipino people have come to understand that complete self-government is so precious its procurement and possession are worth a good deal of suffering. I think they have learned that lesson during their life under our flag, and I am willing to trust them.

NEW ASPECTS OF PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

If press dispatches are correct, some opposition against the act of Congress has been created in the Philippines. These reports declare that some members of the legislature have joined in this opposition and committed themselves to oppose the act even before the return of the mission to the islands to give an account of its stewardship and before they had given themselves or the Filipino people a chance to be informed by their official representatives who are familiar with the true significance of the act, the reasons for its provisions, and all the facts and circumstances that influenced its passage.

I cannot give full credence to these reports. Knowing as I do the Filipino people's sincere desire for independence, I am unable to believe that they would reject, summarily and without due deliberation, and except for most potent and vital reasons, this offer of independence. If they should do this, they would be unjust, not only to their American friends who have labored so unselfishly for Philippine freedom and welfare but also to themselves and their posterity.

FOREIGN AGGRESSION UNLIKELY

Is the danger of foreign aggression against an independent Philippine commonwealth as real as some observers declare it to be? That question at once brings Japan to our thoughts. Does not her alleged imperialism menace the Philippines as much as it threatens Manchuria? For my answer I turn to the statement made by Senator BORAH late last autumn. In his opinion, he said, Japan does not covet the Philippines. "Japan is facing in other directions—Manchuria", he declared. Japan's aggression in Manchuria is the cause of many misgivings about the fate of the Philippines; but I do not coincide with them. Indeed, I think Japanese aggression in Manchuria is the strongest possibly warranty of Philippine immunity. Japan will have her hands full in Manchuria for several generations. That great land is a treasury of her necessities—coal, oil, timber, grain. Japanese investments in Manchuria are above a billion dollars. Already she has populous colonies there. These are pragmatic reasons for giving credence to a spokesman of the Japanese Ministry. "We have no desire to acquire the Philippines", he said.

History as well as current events furnishes further basis for the belief that Japan will not undertake conquest of the Philippines. She could have taken them from Spain before we acquired them. Instead, she took Formosa from China, Korea from the Koreans, and Port Arthur from Russia. Besides, the Japanese are not anxious to go to the Philippines. There are only 10,000 of them in the islands now.

The peaceful grant of independence to the people of the Philippines will in itself be a measure of protection. Surely no great power would wish to affront the world by attacking the Philippines after their independence had been bestowed by the United States and recognized by all other nations.

Independence will inevitably alter the economic relationship the Philippines now sustain to the United States. That has been foreseen by Congress. The act makes provision for a trade conference between the representatives of the two countries to adjust the terms of their commercial intercourse. There is little doubt that such a conference could and would decide upon some arrangement reciprocally advantageous.

The act contemplates the protection of the islands against aggression. It authorized the negotiations of a treaty for their neutralization. It appears to me that in the present state of the world such a treaty would be very much more certain of accomplishment than it would have been a few years ago.

The retention of American military and naval reservations would seem to be another means of protecting the Philippines pending the negotiation of a treaty of neutralization, or in its absence if it could not be obtained.

But in the event that a neutralization treaty cannot be concluded and if the United States should finally abandon its naval bases in the Philippines the Filipino people could still look for protection from the several instrumentalities guaranteeing the territorial integrity of nations.

Even this summary reference to the salient provisions of the act reveals how carefully and thoroughly Congress went about the task of safeguarding Philippine interests both during the period of transition and after independence. I do not see how anyone can read the act in the light of all the conditions and circumstances that had to be met in its formulation and yet assert that it lacks consideration for the Filipino people or was drawn with the purpose of serving selfish interests in the United States or elsewhere.

CONCLUSION

It is my confident expectation that the Filipino people will come to realize the true significance of the measure enacted by Congress. I trust they will see in it the fulfillment of a magnanimous policy untainted by selfishness. I hope they will understand that their freedom, accomplished in the manner in which this bill provides it, is unique in the history of human relations and was granted to them only because America is liberty-loving, is true to her principles and traditions, and regardful of her national pledges and commitments. I urge the Philippine people carefully to study the provisions of this charter of their liberty with a view to exercising the right it gives them to accept or reject it. My advice to them is that they weigh in their judgment of it not the small things that it lacks but the great thing that it bestows, namely, their complete independence.

I would have them know, if independence is their supreme desire, as I believe it is, and if political separation from the United States and an opportunity to rule their own destiny is what they want, that this act fulfills that desire under the most favorable terms that the Filipino people can, in my opinion, obtain either now or hereafter.

The bill was conceived in a spirit of friendship for the Filipino people and in sincere sympathy with their welfare. Any legislation granting independence must always encounter the same questions, the same problems, and the same obstacles as those with which we had to cope in enacting this bill.

I know the act will bring difficulties, trials, and hardships to the Philippine people. These are unavoidable. They are part of the cost of independence. Liberty would not be worth while if the road that led to its enjoyment were not marked by struggles and some suffering.

"GABRIEL OVER THE WHITE HOUSE"

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, there is a great deal of interest in the novel and in the picture Gabriel Over the White House. I have here a very beautiful comment upon it which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the comment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BENEDICTION

By Mabelle Jennings

Gabriel over the White House? Why not
Since we, poor mortals pregnant with distrust,
Our burdens heavy and our spirits low,
Our souls dull, battered shields, no more effectual
To take woe upon woe, find solace amidst dark chaos—
We see the ending of the longest day,
We glimpse the silver lining of a sable cloud,
We see a vital spirit and unfaltering.

Archangel sent by God, His will be done,
And if we falter, pressed perchance, too far,
Give him a giant's strength, that he may use it humbly,
To grant the uplifted prayer of hands
That otherwise are helpless.

Give us this day our daily faith, that we May value courage;
Forgive us our sins—fear, doubting, and shameful yielding;
Show us the way, not back but ever forward;
And teach us to do for others what we would have done for us.

O messenger of God, make plain His meaning,
Disperse dark dooms and omens; let the light
Show us how to think, and thinking, how to do,
And doing, follow one who has not erred
Nor flinched in face of dire adversity,
But met his dread opponent face to face
And, reckoning not the cost to self or private gain,
Did do him noble battle—

Hover, O Gabriel,
The starlight, the thin spring sun by day,
Indifferent seem to minds beclouded and belabored,
Reflect your glory upon him whose chore it is to lead us;
Make plain the way to those verdant pastures
Wherein once we dwelled,
And dwelleth unthinking, knowing naught of hardships—

Gabriel over the White House? Why not
Since we, poor mortals, pregnant with distrust,
Our burdens heavy and our spirits low,
Our souls dull, battered shields, no more effectual
To take woe upon woe, find solace amidst dark chaos—
We see the ending of the longest day,
We glimpse the silver lining of a sable cloud,
We see a vital spirit and unfaltering.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power.

THE SENATE AND THE ECONOMIC CONFERENCE—THE NEW FOREIGN POLICY—THE ROOSEVELT DEMOCRATIC INTERNATIONAL EQUALITY

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I crave the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments while I express sentiments which I feel are at this time pertinent under conditions which all will concede surround us. Mr. President, we have before us a bill which we speak of as the farm bill, which is intended to restore agriculture and make such further contributions to the prosperity of our people as it is assumed would be the product of its administration.

I must digress to say to the Senate, and I trust it will not be regarded as too bold an assumption on my part, that from me I would have the country know the outstanding legislative features of our Government. I attract our Nation to the Senate. The efforts on the part of all the Members on either side of this body have in the last month given evidences to the world of a spectacle calculated to attract the attention of history as unprecedented and as the only instance of its kind today in the legislative bodies of the parliamentary world. This body, in the administration legislation which it has been considering and passing, has disclosed the least of partisan political opposition that has been seen in any legislative body today in the civilized world. This consecration to their country certifies to that patriotism that is in the heart of the citizenry of America, reflected through the representatives as they sit under different designations, politically speaking, but who in their actions disclose an exalted unanimity of service—all to their country first.

It was but a short while since, sir, when certain newspapers and magazines were impelled to present to the citizenry of the United States that ceaseless wail against Congress, that ever-increasing condemnation against what they termed the Members of Congress. That occupation seemed to allure their imagination and then delight them as their occupation. It was to hold up the senatorial body as unworthy of the confidence of their countrymen. While no Member of this organization sought to dignify the accusations by giving them too serious turn of refutation, still at this particular moment it is but due our countrymen that their attention be drawn to what the Congress really is and particularly to the record of performance of the United States Senate. Let our citizenry reflect how, without rest, oftentimes without comfort, seeking no holiday, the Senate has taken the burdens as they fell upon it, literally fulfilling the description of Milton on Lycidas, "To scorn delights that they may live laborious days."

Mr. President, the farm bill that is now before the Senate for consideration likewise carries with it the hope of newly revived foreign markets and the suggestion of a purpose that shall operate to bring the world in something of unity toward world peace and international disarmament. This brings us for the moment to ask, how, in this hour, stands this Nation as to international peace? Mr. President, it was but a short while since that the Senate endured me to bring forth the evidence that there was not existing one nation friendly to the United States in all the world. Before the last administration passed out of official duty the statement could have been justly made, and immediately after the administration passed forth and in the beginning of the present era we could count as recurring and multiplying the nations with their expressions of animosity toward us. We could well adopt the expression of the king crying out, "Behold, hang the banners on the outer wall." The cry is, "Still they come!"

But fortunately we turn for the moment. A month of administration has elapsed. We contemplate the situation of the world. We see the nations turning toward the United States of America. The ancient expressions of hatred we no longer hear. The threats issuing from animosities of the days gone by, seemingly born in vengeance against us because of our demand for the payment of the international debt—these seem hushed. All that which to foreign nations indicated that the United States was on the eve of some imposition upon some or all the other countries of the world, seems to have been quelled. Where mutiny survived, a quietude and pacification seems to have blessed the scene. We have become interested at this moment to ask why is this transformation.

We do not speak of this administration in power in a political sense, yet we do call attention to how this administration, 1 month old, has, as the expression of the humanity of the citizens of our country, awakened a new spirit in the world. Evident it is that at first our new policy aroused curiosity, then awakened great interest, and now is fixed in admiration with abiding confidence.

We turn to see the varying aspects of the change. We cannot forget that but a short while since the oriental nation of Japan felt aggrieved that the official Government at Washington had announced through its State Department that whatever had transpired as a result in the way of an adjustment or acquisition of territory in the land of Manchuria, if obtained by force, would not be recognized by the United States. This awakened a resentment and at once the threat of retaliation. The distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] had occasion to allude, on the morning of the public utterances which appeared in the press, that Japan had given us a notice to remove the fleet of the American Navy from Pacific waters. Today it is pleasant to note that these voices of threat, which seemed to be filled with danger, have at least become silent and we pause to consider the neighbor.

China resented that numbers of the officials of our Government had held her land up as one of brigands and murderers and unworthy of the approval or yet the association of civilization. She, too, within the last month turned in the quadrangular form of her Government to make her appeal to the United States as an aid to world friendship.

We turn then to contemplate the real situation as it now exists in the world. If I appear to say a word that looks as if it exudes a confidence from some source, let it be understood I speak only upon my own authority and with no suggestion from any other source. But this country must know some feature of the military and industrial status of the world as it now confronts us.

England in the preservation of what she feels to be her rights, long established in some form in the Orient, has within the last 10 days consummated the revival of her treaty with Japan such as was had by her with Japan at the time of the Japanese-Russian War. England covertly finds this action justified for the preservation of what she assumes are her property interests, as well as the interests of her subjects living in the Orient.

At the same time, sir, within the last 30 days, and concluded by signature in the last 3 days, France has renewed her bond of friendship and commercial reciprocity with new Russia. In this respect there has been revived the old understanding which was between herself and the old Russia of the imperial Czar. This has for its purpose placing behind France, in the event of necessity, not only the commercial contribution of Russia, but the vast army she could contribute to any purpose France found essential to her welfare or to her defense.

Italy makes the gesture in the last week supporting that which a month before was undertaken covertly by Mussolini—that of joining Austria, her once enemy—and seeking to have Germany make the triangle in its completion of the arrangements between them. To this the Little Entente is supposed to contribute such favor as its financial or its industrial interests or its national defense would call for.

Mr. President, how can we fail to ask the question, To what object are these new spheres of influence being aligned? It is a preparation for conflict of some calculated nature. It means the readiness for a general European war. The late President of the United States, Mr. Wilson, in a message before the joint tribunal of the House and the Senate, fateful in his history, delighted to say that "the old age of the spheres of influence and other secret combinations had come to an end", and he praised the sources of heaven that, under the direction of that which was imperial in its celestial power, we, the United States, could take praise for our contribution to that "consummation devoutly wished." But today we must confront courageously the truth that not only have the spheres of influence not ceased but they have revived themselves in an ardor quite exceeding that which inspired them in the past, and with a purpose more ingeniously hidden and more adroitly disguised than that which was ever known before. Previously, as my eminent colleagues sitting about me will recall, it was ever the boast of the countries to publish their alliances when executed in compacts as early as they could, that their strength might be disclosed, and in the divulgence of the combined power there might be warded off the anticipated assault which they fancied would have come without the knowledge of their aggregated power.

Now, Mr. President, how stand we as to this?

We are on the eve of calling what is designated through the press as an economic conference. I rise to say that it is fortunate for our country that we have waked up to one fact so essential to be now considered, and which previously should have been regarded, but unhappily for us has been ignored too long. It was, sir, that any attempt to bring the nations of the earth together in a solemn assemblage where they all sat at a table in the presence of each other always misled the United States; not that it could have been said to have been the intention, but because, Mr. President and Senators, these representatives of the foreign lands, however frank they might have been to us, if in an individual audience, to aid us in the furtherance of a policy of disarmament or peace, could not, in the presence of the enemies who had been the inherited foes of their fathers, reveal their own status in the military strength of their capacity or in the financial limits of their treasuries. To do this was but to invite those who had long since threatened reprisals, either as excited by results of the World War or as the fulfillment of this threat of inherited hatred, spurred on by the germ of ancient grudge. The result was that however anxious these foreign delegates may have been to reveal to us and our delegates the truth they could not do so because of the surroundings which impeded, and that which obstructed to an extreme degree such possibility.

Mr. President, I therefore wish now to invite the attention of the country to the fact that the United States has at last, under splendid guidance, without political tinge or color, and certainly without partisan purpose, conceived the real truth, which was and is that it is only when the United States can summon these separate nations individually around the table in conference with her in the fulfillment of the sacred injunction—that we are able to feel the atmosphere of the first aspect of this generation toward a universal peace reflected toward us. We are now proceeding, sir, to summon the nations separately, calling them individually, that each may present its wishes, so far as it feels we could supply them, and each designate its grievances to whatever extent it may imagine their extent or describe their relations and existence.

> Come now, and let us reason together—

Therefore, Mr. President, today we call attention to the fact that America now, not by a mere expression but by conduct, has at last been placed in a position where she can say to the earth, "There shall not be wars if there be any manner in which—through friendship or the cooperation of intelligence from a patriotic body of a great nation, the United States—such can be prevented."

We have now ceased to feel that to the League of Nations, on the one hand, as an assemblage, or to the World Court, on the other, or to the intermediate body of self-constituted conventions of nations, there are to be submitted the grievances of the nations of the world, or the revelation of their conditions as they stand in a military array or financial procession before the earth. This conference, called by the administration, supported by the citizenry of all parties, looks to the object of first ameliorating any grievance each nation may have against us. This is to be done by professing and proceeding with any form of concession that justice would call for. Here it is we initiate any form of arbitration which common humanity can approve. We have at last invited the whole world, sir, to behold that there is a method by which mankind may be preserved from the devastating effects of military conflict and the irreparable destruction of war.

Mr. President, we stand here today to keep in mind that America need only carry out her mission; and, carrying it out in this individual capacity and method which we have now devised and put forth, we can paraphrase with Philip Faulconbridge in King John:

> Now these, her princes, are come home again,
> Come the three corners of the world in arms,
> And we shall shock them. Nought shall make us rue,
> If America to itself do rest but true.

Mr. President, with the passage of the bill now before this body, so splendidly amplified by the able address of the leader of the majority, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is to be followed by the eminent gentlemen upon my left whom we speak of as Republicans, and those who are schooled in the matter of agriculture, such as the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], we will have before us the fulfilment of the objects of the administration preliminary to the meeting of this economic conference, called nation by nation. Here in this convention each nation, through its representatives, is now to present to America its desires.

Here, Mr. President, as I come to the conclusion of my observations, feeling a sense of gratitude to my eminent colleagues who sit so attentively and bear audience with me, I now ask the world, so far as my petty voice may reach such a sphere, to note that when the proposition is made by Mussolini in behalf of Italy to three nations to join as something of a guardian of the peace of Europe, England, cooperating through its Premier, joins in the suggestion that "if you will have the United States understand the proposition and cooperate with us, we can make a success of this undertaking." Promptly, therefore, sir, the appeal is made to us that we enter into the understanding looking to the commercial preservation of those whose nations find themselves somewhat down-cast in their material development; and by those others, sir, who but a short while ago drew the sword from the scabbard and held it shining, ready for the splitting of their opponents, but who have now sheathed it in its scabbard for the moment and moved toward the United States of America to seek the cooperation toward conciliation of this our Government to whatever extent it may go and to the fullness to which it can yield. All strive to make sure the undertaking suggested by the eminent heads of the European governments. Thus we are able to present to the world the new confidence of the new mankind of earth in this new administration of America in power in the United States, all to be beheld in admiration by all our fellow countrymen of all political faiths.

Mr. President, it is a source of gratification that the bill that is now before us, as the bills which preceded it and those that shall come after, are all being viewed by men of all political complexions—particularly honorable gentlemen who honor themselves through their service in this body—as that which is to go to the welfare of country rather than to the mere service and emoluments political of any party.

Therefore, Mr. President, I felt that the moment prompted me to express the situation as we see it, and now to inform the country that we are on the eve of that peaceful adjustment long prayed for—surely to endure—for the while. Sirs, until such have been disrupted by some method we do not now anticipate, and which we pray God may be avoided, we can feel that at present we are on the eve of enjoying these civil measures to the full extent of the material benefits they may confer and also the peace which they may transfer to the civilization of the earth, through this our own United States.

And now, Mr. President, I call attention, sir, to the final apex that must not be ignored.

The United States of America at this hour is under very serious suspicion from world nations of late hostility toward us as to whether this call of conference by the present friendship of nations or whether it is an underground—subterranean method of eluding commercial opposition and placing ourselves in a position of superiority to serve the markets of Europe. We are under suspicion, and now under charges in the last few days of the heads of certain large financial institutions, of having for our purpose something touching the finances of the countries of the world destructive to what is called exchange. The charge is we are preparing to readjust, if not to surrender, our gold standard as a trade for markets; and this, it is claimed, melts equally the chances and the prospects of a "sure stability", as it is termed, of the values of money.

On these subjects I have nothing to add. I cannot contribute anything comparable to what has been suggested by eminent gentlemen specializing upon the lines of the matter of gold and silver, nor can I counsel upon the question of the general exchanges of what we may speak of as our notes of money. But, Mr. President, I cannot fail, sir, to cite here, in the presence of the eminent gentlemen who in their patriotism constitute this tribunal, already the deliberate attempt to break the forthcoming economic conference into fragments and into hatreds by first striving to create antagonisms against the very order and call of the distinguished President of the United States, cooperated in as it is by all the people of America who look for prosperity, dream of advance in progress, and wish the work all to be for the welfare of mankind.

Mr. President, I say—and I conclude with the observation, meaning no malediction—that I cannot overlook the opportunity at this moment to remark that these eminent bankers who lately, in an assemblage, have heralded this threat and made this charge, are the gentlemen who, in every undertaking by either administration—that which was preceding this or our own—bided their time to find some way to hold the Congress of the United States up to the contumely of the public. It is they who would ever indict it as being unworthy of trust, and impeach it as an organization of ignorance, when it came to the matter of finance. These eminent gentlemen in whom, they feel, has been reposed all intelligence and patriotism, are those who brought this country to the lowest degree of finance and credit to which it has ever descended in all its history. It is they who visited upon the poor and the helpless in millions and millions the fate whose consequences they are unable to resist or survive—it is they, indifferent to their crimes against humanity, utterly indifferent to the offense they have committed against patriotism—it is these who already begin to duplicate their previous course. Here it is, sir, that we, in common voice, give them notice, they shall not succeed! Their past efforts are before the world, and, as to America, too well understood. They will be without influence. The activities of the honorable committees which are investigating certain conduct on the part of these eminent financiers which in many respects, sir, should bring upon them the opprobrium and odium of all their fellow mankind, should be a warning to them that they cannot now succeed in demolishing the only attempt that seemingly has success before it in the years that we have lived since the World War. From all honest men come to them the malediction, "Out dam'd spot—out."

Mr. President, I congratulate the administration upon the measures brought here, and I felicitate this honorable body upon the splendid spirit disclosed in meeting them. All this must afford comfort to the world in its present aspects, as we now know them. We are moving largely to the melting of every grievance by the methods which can prevail. We turn for the moment to call attention to how the United States moves out to her new mission. I invite gentlemen to contemplate this, our country, seeking no conquest, advancing in no aggression, making no demands of penalty, accepting no reward but the realization of performances which shall ameliorate the conditions and lighten the severe burdens which are now resting upon mankind.

Behold this, your land, under the new dispensation, moves out to the temple of the international relations. May we not conceive her as she advances before us. Around her brow are bound the Ten Commandments of God. In her right hand the Sermon on the Mount; in her left hand the Constitution of the United States. Armored in this trinity she ascends to the new chancellory as high priest of the service. If there shall be those who shall cry out the challenge, "Who comes?" let us feel that all the glad earth will respond as they answer, "Thank God, this is America." [Applause from the floor.]

I thank the Senate. (Applause on the floor of the Senate.)

TENNESSEE VALLEY DEVELOPMENT—MUSCLE SHOALS (H.DOC. NO. 15)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Congress:

The continued idleness of a great national investment in the Tennessee Valley leads me to ask the Congress for legislation necessary to enlist this project in the service of the people.

It is clear that the Muscle Shoals development is but a small part of the potential public usefulness of the entire Tennessee River. Such use, if envisioned in its entirety, transcends mere power development: it enters the wide fields of flood control, soil erosion, afforestation, elimination from agricultural use of marginal lands, and distribution and diversification of industry. In short, this power development of war days leads logically to national planning for a complete river watershed involving many States and the future lives and welfare of millions. It touches and gives life to all forms of human concerns.

I, therefore, suggest to the Congress legislation to create a Tennessee Valley Authority—a corporation clothed with the power of Government but possessed of the flexibility and initiative of a private enterprise. It should be charged with the broadest duty of planning for the proper use, conservation, and development of the natural resources of the Tennessee River drainage basin and its adjoining territory for the general social and economic welfare of the Nation. This authority should also be clothed with the necessary power to carry these plans into effect. Its duty should be the rehabilitation of the Muscle Shoals development and the coordination of it with the wider plan.

Many hard lessons have taught us the human waste that results from lack of planning. Here and there a few wise cities and counties have looked ahead and planned. But our Nation has "just grown." It is time to extend planning to a wider field, in this instance comprehending in one great project many States directly concerned with the basin of one of our greatest rivers.

This in a true sense is a return to the spirit and vision of the pioneer. If we are successful here we can march on, step by step, in a like development of other great natural territorial units within our borders.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 10, 1933.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the opposition that was raised the other day to taking up Senate bill 1094, a bill for the relief of insurance companies, has been withdrawn, and I think we could dispose of that bill in a very few minutes. I appeal to the Senator from South Carolina to allow us to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily, and to take up Senate bill 1094, an important measure, which, if it is not passed soon, need not be passed at all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator that I shall object to its consideration unless there shall be full explanation, far greater explanation than we have had, and until certain facts have been developed through such explanation as will justify, in my opinion, a consideration of the bill and its passage.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, every Senator here knows that the most urgent and important matter before this body is the farm relief bill. Every hour of delay counts against the proper operation of the measure, and I do not feel that I would be properly discharging my duty if I did not object to the consideration of every matter that might delay the passage of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

6-HOUR DAY AND 30-HOUR WEEK—MOTION TO RECONSIDER

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, on Friday afternoon, just before the Senate closed, a motion was made to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the 30-hour week bill. The Senate had debated that measure for 4 days, so I assume it will not require any extended debate.

It is also my information, from the press, that the House committee has set tomorrow for hearings on the bill. I should like to ask that the motion to reconsider be voted upon. Of course, I do not desire to ask that it be voted upon without the Senator who made the motion having a chance to debate it; but, as much as I favor rapid action on the agricultural bill, I do think that the 30-hour week bill is very important, along with the agricultural measure. I cannot anticipate that it will require any lengthy argument to dispose of the motion to reconsider, when the bill was so fully debated when it passed. I should like to have the motion disposed of.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I made the motion to reconsider, and I cannot give any assurance as to how much time might be occupied in consideration of the motion. I do not imagine a great length of time will be taken, but that will be more easily determined after we get into a consideration of the motion, and hear what others have to say, and also to what extent they will have to answer questions which are propounded. I cannot give any assurance of a really brief debate over the question.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the motion to reconsider be taken up and voted on at 2 o'clock.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask that the motion to reconsider be taken up and voted on at 3 o'clock.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to state that this matter was debated 4 days. There is evidently no intention to try to give it that speedy consideration which a motion to reconsider justifies. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida whether he is willing to enter into a unanimous-consent agreement to vote at any time this afternoon?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I do not care to agree to that, when I know that the time will be occupied upon other subjects. Of course, some little time was occupied in the debate on the bill, but I am duly within my rights in making the motion, and I do not see any reason why there is any great haste about this bill getting out of the Senate. I will not attempt any unduly delay, I do not want any undue delay, but I do desire to have an opportunity to discuss some features of the bill, and I suppose there are other Senators who wish to discuss some features of the bill. There is nothing out of the ordinary in making a motion to reconsider, there is nothing out of the ordinary in taking a reasonable amount of time in the debate on the motion to reconsider, and I am not going to enter into a unanimous-consent agreement for a vote this afternoon.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to state that as soon after 3 o'clock as I can get the floor for that purpose, I shall make a motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. McNARY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McNARY. When there is unfinished business pending before the Senate is a motion in order, under the rule, to proceed to the consideration of another matter or motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion for the consideration of the motion to reconsider would be in order. The Chair understands that the motion to lay that motion on the table would not now be in order, but the motion to reconsider would have to be before the Senate, and then a motion to lay it on the table would be in order.

Mr. McNARY. The parliamentary inquiry takes this turn, Is it permissible for the Senator from Alabama, in view of the pending unfinished business, to move to take up the motion to reconsider at this time, or would he not require unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the motion to take up the motion to reconsider were agreed to, it would then be the unfinished business.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The motion to reconsider would displace the pending bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would displace the pending bill. If the motion of the Senator from Alabama to take up the motion to reconsider were defeated, it would be tantamount to the Senate refusing to reconsider, and the bill would go to the House.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, in order that it may not be said that I made the motion without explaining the reason, I desire to take a very brief time in explaining my position.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not wish to contribute to any controversy about the motion at this time, but I do not think it is correct to say that if the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of the motion to reconsider the vote that would operate as a defeat of the motion to reconsider. The motion to reconsider must be made within a limited time, under the rules of the Senate, and if it is not made within that time it lapses. However, the Senate might very well refuse to displace the pending bill and at the same time not be opposed to reconsideration. The unwillingness to displace the pending bill might be the reason for refusing to take up the motion to reconsider. Some of us would not wish to displace the pending legislation on motion in order to take up the motion to reconsider. The motion to table, of course, cannot be made unless the motion to reconsider is taken up.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If the Senator from Alabama pursues the course which he states he intends to follow, the question would not be, Will the Senate reconsider the vote? but it would be a question of displacing the pending matter for the purpose of taking up the other for consideration. That is what the question would be.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is the way it was stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair state the rule as he understands it from the parliamentary clerk. The rule laid down by the Senator from Arkansas is correct, and the statement made by the Chair was not in accordance with the rules of the Senate. In another body over which the Chair presided that was the rule.

The motion of the Senator from Alabama is not a privileged motion at this time, because the bill of the Senator from South Carolina is under consideration, and is the order of business in the Senate.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. I do not understand, however, that I would not have a right to make a motion to displace the pending business if I decided to do so, and thereafter, as soon as I could get the floor, I could make a motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. I understand the ruling of the Chair to be that a motion to take up the motion to reconsider would be in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is in order as the parliamentarian advises the Chair. He also says it is not a privileged motion. Just how it can be in order and not be a privileged motion it is difficult for the Chair to see, and a point of order would lie against it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think the situation is about as follows: Not being a privileged question, it could not come up and still permit the unfinished business to retain its present status, and if it is of privileged character, and should come up, it would, in fact, displace the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is exactly what the Chair was advised. If it is a privileged matter, and comes up in that form, it certainly will displace the business before the Senate. The philosophy of the ruling does not appeal to the Chair at all. The Chair does not understand how it cannot be privileged and then be privileged; but if it is privileged and comes before the Senate it displaces the pending business.

May the Chair remark that the parliamentary situation seems to him to be this: This is a privileged motion, we will say; the Senate votes it down; it is still pending; there may be another vote 10 days from now, and the Senate may vote it down again, but it still remains before the Senate, as the rules are, so far as the Chair can see.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLARK. Is not this the situation in this matter: The Senate by order has made the agricultural relief bill the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CLARK. A motion to reconsider the 30-hour law is not a privileged motion. If it were a privileged motion, it would not require a motion to take it up and displace the unfinished business, but it could be taken up automatically as having privilege. Since, however, it is not privileged it requires a motion to displace the unfinished business and to consider the motion to reconsider, but such a motion would be in order if voted for by a majority of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is whether or not it is a privileged motion and whether the Chair may recognize the Senator from Alabama to make the motion. If the motion is carried, it displaces the pending business. That is the parliamentary status, as the Chair understands.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, there is no way by which the Senator from Alabama can get his motion up except by displacing the unfinished business or by unanimous consent?

Mr. BLACK. That is so, according to the ruling of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The parliamentary clerk advises the Chair that it could be taken care of in what is known as "the morning hour." Of course, so long as the Senate takes recesses each afternoon, there is no morning hour.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Chair if it should be taken up during the morning hour, and the opposition should debate it until the morning hour had closed, would it continue to be the unfinished business or would it be displaced by the pending bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would construe the rule to mean that the unfinished business would be laid before the Senate at the hour of 2 o'clock, at the end of the morning hour. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the motion to reconsider has been entered within the 2 days prescribed by the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then, when the business of the Senate permits, the Senator from Alabama may himself make the motion to reconsider.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the Chair's understanding of the rule.

Mr. BLACK. I understood the motion had already been made.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The motion has been entered, but the Senator from Alabama may call up the motion at any time when the business of the Senate permits. I think he is entitled to have the motion disposed of with reasonable promptness, and I will move an adjournment of the Senate today in order that he may have the opportunity of calling up the motion tomorrow.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I have no disposition to try unduly to delay the consideration of the motion to reconsider, but I think it is entitled to a fair hearing and a reasonable length of time for discussion. I do not wish to have it understood that I have any disposition not to have the motion considered; I wish to have it considered. I wish to have it disposed of upon its merits; that is all I am asking for; but not under the gag rule of the motion to lay on the table, as the Senator proposes to do. He suggests the adoption of a gag rule by making a motion to lay on the table, though I will guarantee he occupied half of all the time that was consumed when this bill was before the Senate for consideration prior to the vote on its passage. All I want is a reasonable length of time for the consideration of the motion.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I regret the excitement that the suggestion seems to have provoked. As a matter of fact, what I desire is prompt action on the motion. Before I made the statement that I would make a motion to lay on the table I attempted to obtain from the Senator from Florida, who was the only objector, an agreement as to some definite period within which a vote could be taken. Since the Senator would not make such an agreement, the natural conclusion was that he did not want the motion to be voted on within any reasonable time. It was for that reason that I made the statement I did, that I would make a motion to lay on the table after a certain period of time. In view of the statement of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that the Senate will adjourn this afternoon in order that the motion to reconsider may be taken up tomorrow—I understood the Senator from Arkansas to so state.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I said that I would move an adjournment of the Senate this afternoon. The Senate, of course, will have the option of adjourning or refusing to adjourn.

Mr. BLACK. I understand that. On the statement of the Senator from Arkansas that he will move to adjourn in order that we may take up the motion to reconsider tomorrow, I shall, of course, not make the motion which I said a few moments ago I would make. There was no desire on my part then nor is there now to prevent any discussion. There were 4 days during which the bill could be discussed; the floor was open to all Senators who desired it, and after it had been discussed for some time, a voluntary limitation of debate was made. I have no desire to prevent the Senator from Florida discussing the bill; he has a perfect right to discuss it; he has a perfect right to make his motion, just as he says; but, insofar as I am concerned, with the statement of the Senator from Arkansas that he will move to adjourn in order that we may take up the motion during the morning hour tomorrow, I shall not make any other motion.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. SMITH. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask to modify the amendment which I have proposed and send the amendment as modified to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York, as modified, will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 18, after the word "tobacco", it is proposed to insert the words "milk and its products"; and on the same page, in line 20, after the word "tobacco", also to insert the words "milk and its products."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment as modified is to have the base period in the case of milk coincide with the base period for tobacco. I had originally asked that the base period for milk and its products be from 1919 to 1923, inclusive, but on further study of the matter it seems to me that to accept the language of the proposed amendment as it relates to tobacco would be better.

I want once more to call attention to this fact: If the base period provided for originally in the bill, namely, from August 1909 to July 1914, were to be used as regards milk, a great injustice would be done to the dairy farmers of the country. It was at that period when the fight was on between the distributors of the cities seeking to exploit the farmers. The price of milk was driven down to a very low point. For instance, in 1911 it was down to $1.71 per hundred. At about the end of the base period as provided here there were cooperatives formed in my State, the Dairymen's League Cooperative Association, and throughout the country there were formed other cooperative associations. In consequence the farmer was getting during the period from 1919 to 1928 a fair price for his milk. Of course, at this time, the price is very low, about $1.33 a hundred, but the period from 1919 to 1928 would seem to be a normal period when there was a normal price for milk, and that period should be adopted as the base if we are to provide for a "fair exchange value" of the commodity, according to the language of the bill on page 12, where it reads:

> The fair exchange value of a commodity shall be the price therefor that will give the commodity the same purchasing power, with respect to articles farmers buy, as such commodity had during the base period specified in section 2.

Mr. President, if we were to use the general base period of the bill and apply it to milk there would not be a fair exchange price which would give the dairy farmer any chance whatever.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am asking—and I have been supported in offering this amendment by telephone conversations with milk producers in my State—the Senate to give milk and its products exactly the same consideration that it is proposed to give tobacco under the terms of the committee amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, of course, I am not conversant enough with milk and its products in a marketing sense to speak authoritatively on the question. We had witnesses before the committee, perhaps as many representing milk as those representing any other product, and there was not at any time one objection raised as to the base period proposed. There may be some years that would more nearly represent a proper price for milk and its products than during the period from 1909 to 1914; but I am sure the members of the committee will bear me out in the statement that there was not any objection whatever raised to the base period provided in the bill as reported. The question is left entirely with the Senate. I have no information whatever as to what was the price of milk and its products during the period that has been selected as the base period, nor have I any figures as to what was the price during the period which the Senator from New York desires to specify. I want to state that we did have very particular and elaborate statements with reference to the base period for all other commodities and with reference to the modification of the base period for tobacco, but we had none whatever with reference to milk.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me suggest to the Senator that I am confident an examination of the figures will prove the soundness of my contention. I realize it is not fair to the chairman or to the committee to attempt to deal with a matter so intricate in this offhand manner; but let me suggest to the Senator that he permit the amendment which I have offered to go to conference. In the meantime the Agricultural Department will develop the full facts, in order to determine whether or not the position I take is the correct one. If it is determined otherwise, I shall not resist any change which may be made in the bill. But no one can examine the figures without appreciating the full truth of what I am saying regarding the injustice to the dairy farmer if the proposed base period is accepted for milk and its products.

May I say, too, that my interest in this matter is more than an academic interest. For a good many years, through my office as commissioner of health of the city of New York, I had supervision over the quality of the milk supply throughout the eastern section of the country. We received in New York City milk from seven States and the Dominion of Canada. Naturally, I became very conversant with the efforts of the dairy farmers to improve their status. Indeed, I had much to do with the early efforts of the cooperatives in our section to improve conditions. Because of that experience I was forced to learn a good deal about the industry.

I invite attention more specifically to the prices which were received by the milk farmer. From 1909 to 1914 the average price was $1.79 per hundred pounds. Then came the period of the development of the cooperatives, and in the period from 1919 to 1923 the average price was $2.93. The average price for the period which I now suggest, which coincides with the tobacco period, the 10 years from 1919 to 1928, was $2.73, which the Senator from South Carolina will see is less than $1 per hundred pounds more than was received during the proposed base period.

More than that, if we are to have the fair value for the purchase of other things used by the farmer applied to the milk farmer, as well as to the other farmers, he will not get such fair value if it is founded upon the general base period proposed. On the other hand, if the period which the tobacco farmers have determined upon is used also by the dairy farmers, I think it is a perfectly fair proposition that the dairy farmers then will have a fair share of return upon their products.

Let me appeal to the Senator from South Carolina that he do not resist the change. There will be time for the Department of Agriculture to present to us the conditions underlying the problem and then, as I said, if it is found in conference that it is desirable to make the change back to the original base proposed, I shall not resist it.

Mr. SMITH. Let me ask the Senator what the tariff is now on milk imported from Canada?

Mr. COPELAND. I have forgotten for the moment.

Mr. SMITH. The reason I call attention to that is that under the terms of the bill, whatever tax is laid upon milk and its products, in raising it to the parity existing, even as indicated by the Senator, there automatically is applied a tariff on importations equal to whatever that tax may be.

Mr. COPELAND. I realize that.

Mr. SMITH. Therefore the Senator recognizes at once that that would bring about an embargo, of course.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator will recall that at the instance of former Senator Lenroot, of Wisconsin, I believe it was, the recommendation of the Tariff Commission was accepted, establishing a tariff on milk from Canada. Whatever benefit the milk producers of the United States can have from the tariff, they have already had.

As the Senator may know from reading his newspaper, there is now a milk war on in my State. The dairy farmers, because of the low prices received from the distributors of milk, have gone out and destroyed the milk. Early Sunday morning, yesterday, in a session continuing over from Saturday night, a bill was passed by the New York Legislature seeking to establish in my State a price-fixing committee for milk. The problem is a very pressing one, and there can be no doubt about the necessity for helping the dairy farmer.

It is that fact which has given me sympathy with the pending bill, many features of which I have not approved. But if there is in it really any hope of relief for the distressed farmers, I shall be happy to vote for it. But I am sure there will be no relief to the dairy farmer if the base period proposed is applied to milk and its products.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COOLIDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. LONG. What is it the Senator said about the tariff? Is it expected that we are going to have a tariff to take up the difference in the cost of production?

Mr. SMITH. The bill provides that whatever tax is levied to equalize the difference, automatically that amount is added to whatever tariff exists.

Mr. LONG. That puts a tariff on it?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator from Louisiana that if the bill shall ever become a law, we will have relegated to the Secretary of Agriculture the high duty to impose embargo tariffs upon all the commodities and the subsidiaries, if I may use the expression, of the commodities that are included within the bill. The Congress is to abdicate its right to impose tariffs and give to the Secretary of Agriculture that legislative privilege.

Mr. LONG. It gives the right to increase the tariff?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; automatically. In order to be perfectly fair and that Senators may understand the parity price, as it is raised, the tax will diminish just to that extent. In other words, if we want to raise the price of wheat to 90 cents a bushel and wheat is now 40 cents, there would ultimately be a rise by imposition of the tax up to the time it reached 90 cents. Then, when wheat reached 90 cents the tax would be taken off and the tariff would be taken off.

Mr. LONG. We would not take the tariff off. If we did, the price of wheat would go right back down.

Mr. SMITH. That is the provision of the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The tariff would not go off in its entirety. The rate of tariff is merely adjusted up or down to vary according to the prices, so there will always be a sufficient tariff rate to prevent importations.

Mr. SMITH. As I understand the bill, a tariff is imposed equal to the tax. Therefore, as the tax diminishes, the tariff will diminish. But it is not clear how it will be done. Suppose wheat is 40 cents a bushel and we desire to raise it to 90 cents; there would be 50 cents a bushel bonus or equalization fee. There would automatically be applied to the wheat an additional 50-cent tariff, making the price 90 cents a bushel. Just how that tariff is to be reduced or lowered is not clearly set forth in the bill. I presume that when wheat has finally reached that point there would be imposed a tariff in accordance with the ordinary tariff rules, but I see nothing in the bill that makes that mandatory. It may be, as the Senator from Louisiana suggested, that the tariff would remain permanently until such time as world wheat reaches the level of domestic wheat.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. In order to make the bill effective at all it is necessary to place practically an embargo upon all commodities. If we do not place an embargo on them, it will be impossible to make the bill effective because of the depreciated currencies of other countries.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] a question. He has referred to the milk war which is in progress in his State between milk producers and consumers, the public and the distributors. The Senator will know as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia that we have had complaints from numbers of persons in the District to the effect that there is a monopoly or some great organization that purchases milk from the farmers and monopolizes the market and charges prices for the products sold to the people in the District greatly in excess of what should be received. I was wondering if the situation in New York which has created this disturbance has not grown out of the fact that there is an attempted monopolization by some large dairy organization of all the milk that is produced by the farmers, and that the farmers suffering from monopolistic control are given but a very small price for the milk, but the consumer has to pay an extortionate price?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in answering the question of the Senator from Utah let me say that there was a time when the heavy hand of monopoly affected the farmer, as the Senator has suggested. It was during the period which coincides with the base period fixed in the bill, from 1909 to 1914. Just now the trouble lies in the fact that poverty has reduced the consumption of milk. The normal consumption of milk in New York City is close to 4,000,000 quarts per day, but now it is only 2,500,000 quarts per day, and yet the flow of milk on the farm is the same. There has been such a surplus of milk that it has driven down the price.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator whether the price to the consumer has been reduced?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; it has been reduced.

Mr. KING. Materially?

Mr. COPELAND. Very decidedly; yes.

I want to answer the question about the tariff on milk. The tariff is 6½ cents per gallon, but the amount of milk which has come in from Canada at any time, even when we had free milk from Canada, has been negligible so far as New York is concerned. If we are now seeking to help the dairy farmer, and I am sure that is the desire of Congress, we must not make him conform to the base period which coincides with the most unfortunate period in his existence, the period when monopoly put its heavy hand on the industry. The way the dairy farmers were treated in my territory was outrageous. The distributors at that time arbitrarily said the price for milk would be 2 cents per quart, or $1.60 per hundred pounds, whatever it might be. But there came along the cooperatives, made up of the farmers themselves—75,000 or 80,000 members at one time in the chief cooperative in my section—and they forced better conditions. They went into the city itself and engaged in distributing milk there, so the monopolistic hold disappeared.

I appeal to the Senate and to the Senator in charge of the bill to permit this change in order that there may be an authoritative statement from those who are versed in the matter. I want to say for myself, with somewhat broad knowledge of the subject, that I am satisfied that the base period proposed here will be very damaging to the dairymen or milk producers of the United States. I think we must take a different period. The tobacco men have chosen a particular period, and since that happens to coincide with what, from my standpoint, is a desirable period for milk, I ask that that period be adopted for milk.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the able Senator from New York for a moment.

The base period suggested by the Senator covers a period of 13 years as against 5 in the bill?

Mr. COPELAND. The base period which I suggest is the same as the committee accepted for tobacco, 1919 to 1928—10 years. The Senator will find that on page 2, line 21.

Mr. McNARY. Yes; but I understood that the Senator desired the base period extend from 1909 to 1923.

Mr. COPELAND. On Friday I asked that the period be 1919 to 1923; but when I came to consider the matter, I realized that I might possibly be doing the farmer damage if we took those particular years. If we take the extended period from 1919 to 1928, as proposed for tobacco, it strikes me that that represents a cross section of the time when the farmer was having some fair degree of prosperity, and yet not a time when he was getting an excessive price for his milk. But certainly if we take the other period, the base period as proposed here, we take the dairy farmer in the period of his very greatest depression, and it is not fair to him. That is my judgment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I was somewhat confused by the remarks of the Senator on Friday in the selection of a base period. I do not conceive it to be the purpose of the Congress or of anyone interested in this measure to attempt to fix a base period during the time of the highest price level. It should be based upon a satisfactory price relationship existing between that particular commodity and other agricultural and industrial commodities. The Senator concedes that?

Mr. COPELAND. I agree to that fully.

Mr. McNARY. In the Senator's discussion, as I gather it, he talks about the base period as set forth in the bill as unfair. I do not know in what respect it is unfair. It is one that was brought to the committee and to the Secretary of Agriculture as the result of a union of feeling by various farm leaders. It was passed in the House in that fashion. It came to the Senate. A number of those interested in the dairy industry and the milk industry came before the Senate committee and made no reference to this base period, leaving the impression in the committee that it was wholly satisfactory.

What factor is involved that makes the price relationship unsatisfactory to the milkmen, using the base period as reported by the committee?

Mr. COPELAND. We have the following figures:

1911	1.71
1912	1.32
1913	1.86
1914	1.85

An average of $1.79 a hundred pounds.

Mr. McNARY. What is the average?

Mr. COPELAND. One dollar and seventy-nine cents a hundred pounds.

Mr. McNARY. That is for skimmed milk?

Mr. COPELAND. No; that is for whole milk. That, you see, is about 3½ cents a quart.

Mr. McNARY. Then, if we take the base period and the price level which the Senator mentioned, and add the processing tax, what we may call the creamery tax or the converter's tax, what charge or tax would be levied upon the consumer today for 100 pounds of whole milk under the operation of this bill?

Mr. COPELAND. If this base period were to be taken as the period for milk there would not be anything added to the consumer, because there could not be put on the processor any tax which would bring it up to the price which he has had until year before last.

Mr. SMITH. What is he getting now, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. COPELAND. He is getting $1.31 now, but prior to this he got an average of $1.79.

Mr. SMITH. So the difference then would be the difference between $1.79 and $1.30, if that is the average price?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. Do I take it from the able Senator from New York that if this bill should become a law and were administered the milk producers would receive no aid under the allotment feature of the bill?

Mr. COPELAND. My judgment is that they would not.

Mr. McNARY. What interest has the Senator in the bill with respect to changing the base price, if the milk producers are to receive no benefit under the bill?

Mr. COPELAND. I have no interest in it unless the milk producer is to have some benefit. I would have to hold my nose to vote for it anyhow; but in my section—and I am just as selfish as any Senator, and perhaps no more selfish—I want my farmers to be benefited. Many of my farmers happen to be dairy farmers. If this bill is passed as it is written, I am here to say to the dairy farmers of my State and of this country that they will get no benefit from this bill. On the other hand, they will be paying higher prices for many things that they have to buy in consequence of the passage of the bill. Since the bill is here, I want the New York dairy farmers to have their share of the "gravy", if it is possible for me to get it for them.

Mr. McNARY. What is the benefit now proposed by the Senator in changing the base period over and above the base period set forth in the bill?

Mr. COPELAND. The difference is that the average price in the base period of the bill was $1.79 a hundred. The average price of the 10-year period which the tobacco men have selected would be $2.73 a hundred. It would be virtually a dollar a hundred, or 2 cents a quart. That is the difference.

Mr. McNARY. What is the price level of whole milk now?

Mr. COPELAND. Last year, the lowest in the history of the industry, it was $1.31 a hundred; but I have told the Senate why—poverty, distress, the inability of the people to buy, the practical reduction of the purchase of milk by 50 per cent; but in 1929 and 1930 and 1931 the price was considerably in excess of what it was during the base period of the bill. Unless, however, we take a period for milk which coincides with some degree of prosperity in the milk industry, the milk farmer will not be benefited. In other words, if we take the bill as it is written, there is not a dairy farmer in the United States who will be benefited by the part of the bill referring to milk; but, on the contrary, he will be harmed by reason of the higher prices which he will have to pay for products which he buys.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from New York is keenly anxious to serve the milkmen of his State and section.

Mr. COPELAND. I am. I admit it.

Mr. McNARY. That, of course, is most commendable. From the figures the Senator from New York gives me, I glean that the processor's tax, using his base period, would be about $1.42 a hundred pounds of whole milk.

Mr. COPELAND. Using my period?

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. It would be about 94 cents.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator, as I understood, said that the present current price average——

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, the Senator means on the current price?

Mr. McNARY. Yes. We take the current price average and subtract that from the base period to get the price level.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes. Last year, 1932, the tax would have been 48 cents; but for the extraordinary reason that I have mentioned—poverty, and the lack of demand for milk, and the lower price—1932 is not a fair year to take.

Mr. McNARY. Let me have this understanding with the Senator: Using his own figures as I have noted them here hastily, the present average price of whole milk per 100 pounds is $1.31.

Mr. COPELAND. It was in 1932; yes.

Mr. McNARY. And under his base period the price level would be $2.73.

Mr. COPELAND. Right.

Mr. McNARY. Subtracting $1.31, the present price level, from $2.73, leaves $1.42. That is correct according to the Senator's own figures. That is the processor's tax that will have to be paid by the consumer. The question arises in my mind whether in the great city of New York, and cities about that great metropolitan area and section, that would work a hardship upon the consumers in the very largely increased price level for whole milk.

Mr. COPELAND. If it were actually true that the price for 1933 would be as low as $1.31, I would say yes, it would work a hardship; but I am perfectly satisfied, by reason of legislation which we have perfected, that the price will not be as low as $1.31. It will be in the neighborhood of $2, which is 21 cents higher than the average of the 5 years in the base period.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from New York has given careful thought to this section of the bill. Does he see any complications or complexities in the matter of the administration of the bill as applied to milk?

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, I share with the Senator all the doubts about the bill and about its administration. I think I am as skeptical of it in many ways as the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator probably misunderstands me. I will say to my able friend that I think the bill is practical and practicable as to wheat and cotton, two great nonperishable commodities having an exportable surplus. I entertain serious doubts of the practicability and the workability of this bill as applied to milk and hogs and agricultural products of that kind. So I want to ascertain from the Senator, who has an unusual knowledge of foods, sanitation, and the great problems affecting the metropolitan areas of our country and the thickly congested and settled cities, if, in his opinion, this bill presents any complexities as to administration with respect to milk.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to answer that question rather fully, Mr. President.

My city of New York is a great manufacturing city. People think of it as a financial city. Hardly a day passes but that somebody lambasts Wall Street. One would think that they have nothing but money in New York and that financial affairs are the chief occupation and the chief thought of the people of that city.

As a matter of fact, the city of New York is the greatest manufacturing city in our country. Within the political boundaries of the city, in bulk and value, the manufactured products of New York exceed the combined output of Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Milwaukee, Cleveland, Detroit, and Boston.

When there are depression and poverty on the farms of the United States, there are depression and poverty in the city of New York. When the farmer cannot buy, there are bread lines in New York.

Of course, the pending bill is sure to increase the cost to the consumer. I am more worried about flour than about anything else. If I read this bill correctly and can believe what I have been told about it, the price of flour, if this bill shall be enacted, will be about twice as much as it is today.

When that is reflected in the price of a loaf of bread it does not mean so much, because the price of wheat can be increased 60 cents a bushel before the cost of a loaf of bread will be increased 1 cent. Sixty loaves of bread can be made with 1 bushel of wheat. But 40 percent of the people of the United States make their own bread, and I venture to say that over half of the people in my city of New York make their own bread. When they go to the store and find that they are paying twice as much for flour, after this bill shall be enacted, as they did the week before, they are not going to like it. Nevertheless, the consuming public must bear their part of the burden. If we can rehabilitate agriculture, if we can increase the purchasing power of the farmer, we can sell the manufactured products of New York City, and we cannot do it until then. When the farmer can buy we will prosper in the cities.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose the result of this bill should be to decrease the purchasing power of the urban dwellers? Suppose, by reason of the increase of the price, they should buy less goods, buy less stuff; where would the benefit be to the farmer?

Mr. COPELAND. There would not be any benefit.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator knows well, better than I do, because he is more familiar with that phase of the situation than I, that the urban dwellers today are down to about the lowest margin possible in the way of living. Millions of them are in great distress. They cannot pay much more. If prices are increased, they will have to buy less. I fear the farmer will not benefit in the end.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to say to the Senator, in all frankness, that if it were not for the loan feature of this bill, the hope of the restoration of agriculture by the improvement in its finances, I would not vote for the bill.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has stated my view. I think the refinancing part of the bill, the part providing for the refinancing of farm indebtedness of the United States, is a wise proposal. It will be of great help to the farmer. I am thoroughly in sympathy with it. I want to vote for it, and shall vote for it, and I shall vote for these other things if they are incorporated in the bill, because I want to vote for that part of the bill. But, in my opinion, the allotment proposition may prove as unsatisfactory to the farmers of the United States as the Farm Marketing Act.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I share the feeling of the Senator, and if it were not for the refinancing feature of the bill I could not be induced to vote for it. But the bill is here, and it is going to be passed, and if it is passed I want the dairy farmers of New York, as well as the dairy farmers everywhere in the United States, to have whatever benefits are possible. They will not derive any benefit from it if the base period proposed by the committee shall be accepted as regards milk and milk products.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is discussing the milk phase of the problem. I wish he would translate that for me into terms of sales tax which the ultimate consumer would confront in respect to milk. Then I will understand it. Is this correct, that the Senator believes that if the bill stands as it is there will be no sales tax on the consumer in respect of milk?

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator mean if it passes as it is written?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. No; there will not be any tax on the milk.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Suppose the Senator's amendment should be adopted, what would be the sales tax on a quart of milk?

Mr. COPELAND. About 2 cents.

Mr. VANDENBERG. A 2-cent sales tax on milk?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; and if I had my way, may I say to the Senator from Michigan, I would do away with that and provide for a general sales tax. I feel that that is the way we ought to raise some of our revenue. I am not one of those who say that such a tax is unfair to the working classes—unfair to the poor. As a matter of fact, there is no tax which is so graduated and so fair as the sales tax; because with a sales tax in operation it is the man who has the money, the man who spends the money, who is taxed; and if we exempt from the sales tax food and the other products, proposed to be exempted, there will be no great burden upon the poor of our country.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator think that the people of his city can pay a 2-cent sales tax on milk?

Mr. COPELAND. In my city we are improving the methods of distribution so that there will be cut out between the producer and the consumer a good deal of expense, because we are now going forward in that matter. My own feeling about New York City, therefore, is that the increase will not be so great. But measured mathematically, without reference to these improvements which will take place in distribution and marketing, there would be such a tax as the Senator from Michigan suggests.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is speaking about the change of price to the consumer as a result of the falling of the price or the increasing of the price to the producer. In the admirable address made by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] Friday he dealt with that phase of the problem, and when I heard him a doubt came into my mind at once. The suggestion was that since the prices of raw products have been falling there has not been any serious reflection of that fact in a decrease in the price of the finished product. For example, wheat has gone down, but bread has not gone down accordingly; and the Senator argued from that that if wheat should go up bread would not go up accordingly. It was simply a parity of argument.

I do not agree with that view of it. It is true that the large units which produce the articles of consumption are able to maintain the price when the raw material comes down, but when there is a positive increase in the price of raw material as a result of an act of government, it gives ground immediately for an increase in the price of the finished product, and I do not endorse the argument that if an article has not fallen in price with the falling in price of the raw product, it will not rise with the increase in price of the raw product. Things do not go that way. I assume that the Senator is correct in saying that if there is an increase in the price of wheat by reason of the proposed form of bounty on wheat it will be reflected in the price of flour, but the Senator said he did not think it would be especially reflected in the price of bread. I am assuming it will be reflected in that also.

Mr. COPELAND. There is a very great margin. I think the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] the other day, if I remember correctly, said that of the price received for the ingredients in a loaf of bread, the farmer received only 1.9 cents.

Mr. FESS. One and nine-tenths cents.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, if we increase the price of wheat 60 cents, there is the legitimate excuse for putting 1 cent more on the price of bread and there is no doubt that it will go there. I have no question about it.

Mr. FESS. There is no question about that.

Mr. COPELAND. But I feel myself that one of our great problems in the United States is our failure to reorganize our system of distribution. When the farmer was really prospering he got 7½ billion dollars for his farm products, for which the consumer paid 22½ billion. Fifteen billion dollars, twice the original cost, had been added between the producer and the consumer. I was a member of the milk commission which sat in New York some years ago, and we felt that we had worked out methods by which the distribution of milk could be so improved that there would be a material decrease in the cost of milk to the consumer, and I still think so. But, no matter if those in the cities suffer, if there is any hope in the improvement of farm conditions, the purchasing power of the farmer will be increased. Then the city dweller will have work and greater prosperity.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have some figures, and I would like to ask the Senator from New York if he thinks they are correct. They are figures given out by Professor Warren, of Cornell University, on the distribution of milk and the cost to the consumer, and the price paid to the farmer before, during, and after the war. I am wondering whether the Senator can tell me whether or not these figures are correct? Professor Warren says that in New York City before the war the consumer paid 8 cents a quart for milk and that the farmer got 4 cents; that during the war the consumer paid 16 cents a quart for milk and that the farmer got 8 cents. He says that now the consumer pays 10 cents a quart for milk and that the farmer gets 2 cents. Can the Senator give us any information as to whether or not those figures are correct?

Mr. COPELAND. I fear the Senator has taken figures from Professor Warren, who is a great authority, but has not taken quite all of his figures. In New York we have had on sale several qualities of milk. There has been grade A milk, there has been grade B milk, and bottled milk, and then there has been loose milk. So any figure might be misleading. The city of New York has now determined that all the milk sold must be bottled milk. Consequently, it is sure to cost the consumer more, but it adds to his safety and the lowering of his doctor's bills.

The farmer, in my opinion, has never had a fair share of what the consumer pays for the milk, although I would want to analyze the quoted figures more closely and not simply make a general reply.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. According to these figures, before the war and during the war the farmer got half of what the consumer paid for his milk, and if the figures are correct, he now receives only one fifth.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me say to the Senator that there has not been a time when the farmer got as much as 8 cents a quart for his milk. In 1920 the dairy farmer was at his very best, and at that time he got a little less than 7 cents a quart. It was $3.42 a hundred, a little less than 7 cents a quart. But this last year the farmer got only $1.31 a hundred, which would be about 2½ cents a quart.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I would like to ask the Senator, for my own information, this question: It is hoped that this bill will restore parity in exchange such as existed during the pre-war period. I know that the Senator wants to help the farmer. By this amendment are we to understand that he thinks the parity which existed during the period from 1909 to 1914 would be worse for the farmer than that which existed from 1919 to 1928?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes. I have taken the period from 1919 to 1928, which is much fairer, because during the period from 1919 to 1928, inclusive, the farmer's average price was $2.73 a hundred, while in the base period proposed by the bill it was only $1.79. He gets about 96 cents more per hundred pounds with the later base period than he would if the other were taken.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator mean to tell us that the farmer's milk dollar bought more of industrial products in the period from 1919 to 1928 than it did from 1909 to 1914?

Mr. COPELAND. I think so; yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is not that true of other commodities?

Mr. COPELAND. No; it is not true of other commodities. That is the argument I made. This base period is going to help as regards other commodities, but it is the worst period as regards milk.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator state whether he got his figures from the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. COPELAND. I did.

Mr. McKELLAR. Those figures show that the price was greater from 1909 to 1914 than between 1919 and 1928?

Mr. COPELAND. No; that the price was greater between 1919 and 1928.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the difference, as shown by the figures which the Senator has?

Mr. COPELAND. The average price of the base period fixed in the bill, 1909 to 1914, was $1.79 a hundred. The average price from 1919 to 1928 was $2.73 a hundred.

I appeal to Senators to take this amendment to conference and let the agricultural experts pass judgment upon it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I should like to say that I made the statement a while ago that those who appeared before our committee in the interest of the milk industry did not say anything about the changing of the base period. Most Senators have the report of the hearings before them on their desks.

On page 324 is found the statement of Charles W. Holman, secretary National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation, Washington, D.C. Then follows a list of the members of his organization, most of page 324 and all of page 325 being taken up by that list. I will read just the opening sentences of Mr. Holman's remarks before the committee:

> I am passing around a little map which shows the distribution as to homes where the farmers live. We belong to the constituent units of this organization. It is entirely agricultural in character.
> Mr. Chairman, I have been instructed by the executive committee of our federation—and I will be very brief—to express the approval of the federation of the House bill. We do not advocate any changes in the bill as it came to this committee. We are supporting the bill in all particulars. I shall address myself, however, only to those phases of the bill that may affect the dairy farmers of this country.

Then he goes on to defend the bill in all particulars, and to show that, in his opinion, it would be beneficial to the milk producers.

The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] has offered an amendment which contravenes the detailed statements of one who is the secretary of the National Cooperative Producers' Federation. Of course, as I before stated, and now repeat, I am totally unfamiliar with all the ramifications of the milk business. It was stated before our committee—and I call upon those members of the committee who are hear to bear me out—that it is the most complex of all the commodities included in this bill, insofar as its applicability to the machinery proposed to be set up here is concerned. I say that much in vindication of myself and of the committee.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator from South Carolina just a moment ago, based on the testimony on pages 324 and 325 and those following in the record of the hearings before the Agricultural Committee, said that the Senator from New York has offered an amendment which contravenes the statements of Mr. Charles W. Holman, the secretary of the National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation. I ask the Senator wherein the amendment of the Senator from New York contravenes the statement of the secretary of the National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation as it has been recorded. It appears to me, from a reading of the hearings, that there is nothing in the statement of the secretary of the National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation, as it is called, which at all contravenes the amendment now offered by the Senator from New York nor does the amendment offered by the Senator from New York contravene the statement. The statement of the secretary before the committee merely goes to the general proposition of the bill sent over from the other House and not to the specific proposition of dealing with the milk industry. That is so as I read the statement and as I gather its meaning.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I read what Mr. Holman stated in his opening remarks as follows:

> I have been instructed by the executive committee of our federation—and I will be very brief—to express the approval of the federation of the House bill. We do not advocate any changes in the bill as it came to this committee. We are supporting the bill in all particulars. I shall address myself, however, only to those phases of the bill that may affect the dairy farmers of this country.

Then I find he simply calls attention to the licensing features and the power granted the Secretary of Agriculture from time to time to take cognizance of the operation, but in no place does he suggest a change of the base period; and that is the question before the Senate—Shall we change the base period?

The Senator from New York has already said that during a certain period milk was sold for about $1.79 a hundred. Subsequently the milk producers formed cooperative associations for the purpose of raising the price of milk, according to his statement, nearly double. Subsequent to that the depression set in, and the people became too poor to buy milk, but the cooperatives were still operating, though the people who consumed milk did not have the money with which to buy. Consequently what the cooperatives desired could not be done.

It seems to me that the authority of this spokesman for the milk cooperatives was sufficient for us to reach the conclusion that nobody in the business wanted a change in the bill in any particular. That is all that I, as a member of the committee, have to go by. Of course, I shall leave it to a vote of the Senate as to whether or not they want to change this provision. I have no right and no power, in view of the testimony taken before the committee, to accept the amendment or to say that it should not be accepted, but, as I say, I shall leave it to the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. An argument was made by Mr. Holman. There was no discussion as to a change in the basic period.

Mr. SMITH. No.

Mr. FRAZIER. It was after his statement that the change was made in the case of tobacco.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. FRAZIER. I voted for that change because of the showing that was made by those who knew the situation in the tobacco States.

While $1.79, the average price from 1900 to 1914, would be a great help to the milk producers, if they could obtain that price as compared to present prices, yet the average of $2.73 during the period suggested by the amendment of the Senator from New York as the base period, namely, the period from 1919 to 1928, would be, of course, much better. It would not be too high. In my opinion, even then, they would not make any proper profit, counting in their work. It seems to me that it would be only fair to the dairy farmers to select a base period that would result in an increase in the price of their products.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the only point I make—and it may not be of any real worth to the Senate—is that the tobacco producers did appear and pointed out that the base period selected would not affect them at all; in fact, that they would get less, even with the tax, than they had been getting subsequent to the period thus selected. They therefore asked the committee to change the base period, and select another base period which would put the tobacco producers on a parity, so far as purchasing power is concerned, with the producers of other commodities. They stated that the purchasing power of tobacco at that time was below parity compared with the purchasing power of other agricultural commodities when it came to buying the things which they had to buy. So they selected a period that would more nearly approximate the normal buying power for tobacco. However, there was not one word said about the milk question. Here on the floor of the Senate a Senator who has had a great deal of experience, not as a milk producer but because of his official position by inspection and otherwise, makes a plea for the New York milk producers, and states that the period suggested by him should be the period adopted as affording higher prices. As I have said, I do not feel that I should accept or advise the rejection of the amendment, but I leave it entirely to a vote of the Senate as to whether they think it is a proper thing to do.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As I understand the purpose of the pending bill, it is to establish parity between the purchasing power of farm products and the purchasing power of industrial commodities. It seems to me that the thing for us to determine is what course will insure the greatest degree of parity——

Mr. SMITH. That is correct.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As between the base period of 1909 to 1914 and the base period from 1919 to 1928. The only consideration that should enter into the determination of the question seems to me to be at what period was there the best parity. I am not familiar with the details of that question, but it seems to me it can easily be determined at what period there was the best parity between the agricultural dollar, so far as milk products are concerned, and the dollar of industry. That can easily be ascertained; and if there was a greater approximation to parity during the period contended for by the Senator from New York, it would be perfectly consistent with the philosophy and purpose of the bill to specify that period as the base period for the purpose of establishing a price for milk. If, however, there was a nearer approach to parity during the period from 1909 to 1914, then it would be perfectly consistent with the objects and the purposes of the bill to retain that base for the purpose of carrying out its provisions.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill, so far as the allotment plan is concerned, is to raise the price of farm products to a point where their purchasing power will be on a parity with the purchasing power of the things the farmers have to buy. The nearest we could come to a period where that parity existed was during the years from 1909 to 1914. If during that period, as to a commodity included in those subject to the bill, it can be proven that the parity which we seek did not exist, then the representatives of the product so affected have a right to come here and endeavor to select a period that will, when everything is considered, represent a time when there was such a parity as exists with respect to other commoditioes. As I have said, however, not being familiar with the particular question, and having before us the testimony of the man who represented the milk producers, as a matter of course, milk was not included in the amendment of the Senate committee, because it had not been asked that it be included, nor were the facts given showing why it should be included.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator from New York is exploring ground with which he is not entirely familiar in view of some of the statements and arguments he has made. I am not going to undertake to deal with his reasoning as to the philosophy of this bill, because the immediate question embraces too narrow a subject to spend half a day on when the Department of Agriculture is urging as much speed as we can possibly make so as to get this bill in operation before it is too late to apply it to the present planting season.

Mr. President, some seem to have an idea that the bill fixes the price that dairymen are to get for their milk under its terms. We have simply fixed the base period for the purpose of establishing a parity. During all the discussion I have heard nobody stated what the price of milk was during that base period and the price necessary to bring about parity. That is the only question involved.

Here is the report submitted by the Committee on Agriculture of the House in reporting the bill. It may be recalled that during the last session there was a bill pending before both Houses upon which elaborate hearings were had before committees of the House and Senate. In that bill milk and its products were included. Many witnesses were heard before the committees. In submitting their report the committee placed the price of milk on February 15 of this year at $1.16 per hundred pounds. The report made to them by our Department of Agriculture, the basis that is included in all the statements and figures for the ascertainment of parity prices, is $1.16 per hundred pounds. The parity price for milk then as estimated by that department would be $1.90, an increase of 63 percent. Yet we have heard the assertion here, upon information from some source, that under the parity basis there will be no increased price to the dairymen. However, there are the figures furnished from an official source.

In addition to that, as the chairman of the committee pointed out, the secretary of probably the largest dairy association in America, representing hundreds of other associations, stated that he wanted the bill passed as it passed the House without any change. Who can presume to think that the representative of this industry, in appealing to our committee to make no change in the bill, did not have as the very first and central point of thought the price involved and the benefits involved from a money standpoint? It would be a strange suggestion that they were talking about other phases of the bill without giving direct and intimate and thorough consideration to the question of the effect the terms of the bill would have in dollars and cents upon the members of their association.

So, with full knowledge of the effect, with full knowledge of the increased price that would come to the dairy interests as a result of the parity arrangement contemplated by the bill, this great organization, through its representatives, urged that no change be made. I am sure that many Senators, especially members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, will confirm the statement that telegrams came to them from representatives of dairying associations in all sections of the country urging that we leave the provision as to milk as it was in the bill as it came from the House. They were entirely content, entirely satisfied, with that and were anxious only that no change should be made that would be injurious to their interests.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. In view of the statement which the Senator has just made, I remind him that Charles W. Holman, in his testimony as set forth on page 324 of the hearings, said: "Let there be no change in the bill." I hope that I quote the Senator correctly and that he will correct me if I do not. The bill before the committee at that time was the bill as it passed the House unemasculated by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the Senator say it is emasculated now so far as it refers to the milk industry?

Mr. McCARRAN. I do.

Mr. BANKHEAD. All right; point it out.

Mr. McCARRAN. I say it is emasculated because it has been entirely changed from the original bill as it came from the House and was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate. May I respectfully point out——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I do not want to yield to the Senator for an argument. When I conclude he may take the floor in his own right. I assumed he wanted to interject merely a question.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am leading up to a question now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well.

Mr. McCARRAN. Is it not true that when the secretary of the National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate he appeared to respond to and deal with the bill as it passed the House and was then before that committee, and that all of his statements were addressed to that and nothing else?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Holman, the secretary, came of his own accord as the representative of that association without any limitation upon him as to the subject he should discuss or what might be in his mind relative thereto. He came there as a representative of the milk industry and made the statement which the chairman of the committee has read: "We do not advocate any changes in the bill as it came to this committee." No change has been made, so far as I have been able to follow the bill, which in any way alters its effect upon the dairymen.

Mr. President, after the subject has been so carefully considered by the House committee and the Senate committee and by the representatives of the organized industry, and no dissatisfaction has been expressed anywhere, no opposition having presented itself anywhere, I submit that it is rather dangerous upon the mere suggestion of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] to change the basis as to this commodity. There has been considerable question as to its inclusion in the bill at all because of its highly perishable nature and because it is the only commodity in the bill which does not have an exportable surplus. Still the suggestion is made upon the floor of the Senate that the price of milk to the children of the city of New York should be raised now at a time when their consuming power is lower than at any time in the history of our country. It is suggested that this necessity and essential of life should be lifted clear out of line with the base period of all other commodities in the bill and put on the basis which the Senator admits is the highest possible basis within the history of the industry. I submit that no such change in the interest of the dairymen of New York or of the entire country should be made. Here is an increase proportionate with the increase in other commodities included in the bill, and the Senate should be very careful about making a change affecting so directly and so seriously the type of consumers in the country who would be affected by the change proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, it has seemed to me that the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] deserves comment by Senators from the great milk shed of the United States, because they are quite likely to have that special knowledge which others who reside elsewhere in our country may not have. I think it is not wise for Senators from other sections of our broad country, with its diverse activities, who have no special experience with a product of this character, to undertake to oppose an amendment of the kind offered, which obviously is proposed by one who ought to know, and who no doubt does know, about the subject, whose interest in the public welfare has been manifested so many times, and whose great heart for humanity is always expressing itself in the United States Senate.

I heartily support the Senator from New York in the proposed amendment. I may say, without any attempt at increasing the importance of my few remarks, that I come from the heart of the great milk shed. We have early pastures there. The sun warms the green mountains before ever the valleys get thawed out, and the frost disappears from them. We produce a very fine quality of cattle and a great quantity of milk, considering the area of Vermont.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am very much interested in the remarks of the Senator, and I am sorry that there is so much confusion in the Chamber that it is with great difficulty that I can hear them. I especially ask for order so that we may hear the Senator's remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I shall not speak long on the subject. It seems to me it should take but few words to picture a situation which ought to have weight in the consideration of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

The little State of Vermont produces three fourths of all the milk that is shipped into the city of Boston every morning. The men and women who are maintaining those fine dairies in Vermont have been held down to the grindstone for years because they are not getting adequate prices for their products. They have taken great pride in producing a very fine quality of milk with a high percentage of butterfat, and they continue to battle against adversity of weather and adversity of hard times. They have made a wonderful success of the milk industry.

In the hope of trying to preserve that industry they have for the past 2 years been going through an intelligent struggle for reorganization of the marketing facilities for milk in the State of Vermont. In that effort they have joined the other New England States. Our legislatures in New England, our Governors, and administrative officers have all cooperated in that effort. It has made some progress, but we are far from a solution. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the distinguished witness who has been cited here, Mr. Holman, made statements in his testimony which show that he was not undertaking to bind the Senate; that he was not undertaking to say that if this question arose in such a way that an amendment might be made on the floor of the Senate that would improve the condition of milk it should not be made; for he said this, and I read from page 327 of the hearings:

> There has been a distinct decrease in the buying power of butterfat, and I might call your attention to the fact that in the chief dairy States of the United States we have the highest percentage of farm mortgages outstanding, and our people are having as much difficulty as anybody else in trying to find a gross income on which to pay their interest and their mortgage debts. In that connection the average amount of butterfat that it takes to pay the tax on an acre of land has increased from 1913 to 1932, 176 percent. In other words, while 1 pound of butterfat would pay that much taxes, it now takes 1¾ pounds of butterfat to do that.

Now, let us apply that reasoning to this amendment rather than to take the flat which is set forth somewhere else, which says in effect that he would not recommend the change of a comma in this bill, and we arrive at the conclusion that if Mr. Holman had had before him an amendment which undertook to change the basic period for tobacco, and the distinguished Senator from New York had presented to him this change in the basic period for milk, his testimony would have had an entirely different color. It certainly would not have the absolutism that is contained in the statement that he backed this measure without the change of a comma. His reasoning shows that he would have followed and indorsed the reasoning of the Senator from New York and helped to stabilize and build up this great industry upon which the children as well as the adults of our country are so dependent.

I hope the Senate will accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] for his courtesy. He is always considerate, and I appreciate his kind words. I am not quite so enthusiastic over what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] said about me. Concerning that I want to make this comment, Mr. President:

I may be ignorant of the purposes and effects of this bill, but I am convinced that wisdom regarding it will not die with the Senator from Alabama. He has certainly gone far afield, and made many unintentional but nevertheless real mistakes regarding the purpose of my amendment and the figures relating to it.

I am not ignorant of the fact that we are not fixing prices. I have read the other parts of the bill, and know that we are seeking to establish the fair exchange value of this commodity with the purchasing power that the commodity had during the base period.

Mr. President, regardless of what others may have testified, I am here to say that if this bill were to be enacted into law as written now, the dairy farmer of America will not be benefited.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. COPELAND. I do.

Mr. FESS. The Senator said he was aware that the bill does not attempt to fix prices. I wish the Senator would read, on page 25, subsection (b) of section 20, where it says:

> (b) After such date as shall be specified in the proclamation, it shall be unlawful for any person to purchase any amount of the commodity from the producer or any association of producers at a price, for the domestic consumption percentage thereof, that is less than the proclaimed cost of production for the commodity.

May I ask the Senator whether, in his judgment, that authority to estimate or declare the cost, and the attaching of a penalty if anyone should buy at less than that price, does not fix the price?

Mr. COPELAND. I assume that the Secretary of Agriculture will proclaim the price of milk, and that, when he has done so, that will be the price.

Mr. FESS. I rather think the Senator is in error when he says that this bill does not include price fixing. As I interpret the language of it, it does carry the power to fix the price, based upon what it is determined is the cost of production; that is, it must not be less than that.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator no doubt is right. In my enthusiasm to reply to the remarks of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], perhaps I went farther than I should have; but, of course, what I had in mind when I made the statement was that if we were to make the base period 1920, when the price of milk was at its very highest, $3.42 a hundred, I would not think for a moment that that was going to be the price that the farmer would get now. The question is, What could he buy now with 100 pounds of milk in contrast with what he could buy then? That is the way the matter will be determined. In that sense the direct price in dollars and cents would not be fixed.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say just a word further if I may have the attention of the Senator from South Carolina. I am not in conflict with Mr. Holman a particle. I know him and respect him. I am regretful that I have not had an opportunity to talk with him during the past 2 or 3 days. I had hoped to do so; but, failing to hear from him, I did telephone to other men in the industry who are associated with him in the same organizations.

It is very clear, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] has pointed out, that when Mr. Holman was before the committee it is probable he did not have in mind the base period at all. He was not thinking about that. If the Senator from South Carolina will turn to page 326, it shows that Mr. Holman's enthusiasm was over the licensing feature. If the Senator will notice the paragraph beginning:

> But the particular provisions that we desire to commend to you cover the power giving the Secretary the right to license the trade including the cooperatives, and to control in interstate and foreign commerce operations so far as the licensees are concerned, so far as licensing is concerned.

Then, in another place, he speaks about the mortgage legislation. There is no doubt in my mind that Mr. Holman had in mind the general principles of the bill, not specific things as regards, for instance, the base period for milk. He was not thinking about that, I am confident. What proves it to me is the fact that when I talked on the telephone last night with one of the same organization in New York State, in western New York, he said, "Why, I have not thought about the period. I have not thought about that. I am only thinking about some period which will give us hope of some prosperity in the enactment of the law. By all means change the period."

Mr. President, my only thought in this matter is to help the dairy farmer.

The Senator from South Carolina is wrong when he says that my interest is purely that of one who has had general supervision of a milk supply. I have also had experience, may I say to him, as a producer of milk, so I also sit with him in high places.

But the dairy farmer, Mr. President, has a very responsible place in society. Milk is the most valuable of foods. It is the perfect and essential food at certain ages of life, a necessary food, a balanced food.

Sanitarians have demanded of the milk farmer that he maintain certain standards. He must produce milk under certain conditions. His herd must be a tested herd. The milk must be produced under sanitary supervision. The barns are supervised. Inspectors go there to test the herds, to examine the bacterial content of the milk, to examine the milkers to see if they are free from disease. The milk must be maintained at a certain temperature, taken to the creamery at a certain time, where it is kept at a certain temperature until it is prepared for pasteurization. Then it is pasteurized, and so forth. All these things have added to the cost of milk; and not only that but they have added to the expense of producing milk.

The farmer has to maintain these fine herds and these splendid barns. He has to get up in the night and take care of his sick cows. He has a strenuous life. His wife and children join him in hard work. I am seeking just one thing in what I am trying to do, and that is to help the dairy farmers of the United States, and by helping them I help the farmers of my State.

I am confident that when Mr. Holman comes to study the details and to take the prices given by the Agricultural Department year by year from 1909 down to 1933, he will find that that period, which is the base period of this bill, is the most unfortunate period that could possibly be chosen for the milk farmer, for the dairy farmer. There is no doubt in my mind that with the improvement now taking place in my State in the marketing of milk the price that the milk farmer will have will be certainly as high as he received during the base period of 1909 to 1914. But if he is to be really benefited by the pending bill, some other period must be taken.

And so once more I say to my friend from South Carolina—who knows far more about agriculture than I could possibly know—that I appeal to him to let this amendment go to conference. Then let Mr. Holman and the others who are interested in these various cooperatives, and let the experts of the Department of Agriculture, determine whether or not this is a wise provision which I have suggested. If not, then let the conference amend it.

So, Mr. President, I plead with the Senate to accept this amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator one concluding question? The Senator has referred to the dairies supplying the metropolitan area as affected by the change in the base period. Has the Senator made a national survey to see if this base period is applicable throughout the country?

Mr. COPELAND. The prices I have given are the general rates given to me by the Department of Agriculture for the entire country, and so the conditions which I describe are general conditions and not those of my own immediate locality.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD subsequently said: Mr. President, I was out of the Chamber when the vote was taken on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] changing the base period for milk and its products. I understand the amendment was adopted. If so, I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which it was adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, the processing fee has been referred to as a tax upon the consumer, and from that point of view the question was discussed by Professor Kemmerer, of Princeton University, a few days ago.

In answer to Professor Kemmerer's point of view there appeared in yesterday's New York Times an article written by Dr. John A. Ryan, a noted economist, of Washington, D.C., relative to this fee. He referred to it as not being a tax, and the article is so interesting that I ask that it be printed at this point in the RECORD without being read.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From New York Times, Apr. 9, 1933]

FARM RELIEF LEVIES NOT VIEWED AS TAXES—ASSESSMENTS STIPULATED IN THE PENDING BILL WILL NOT GO TO THE SUPPORT OF THE GOVERNMENT To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

A considerable part of the article by Prof. E. W. Kemmerer in the Times of last Sunday is unintentionally confusing and misleading. I refer to his description and discussion of the assessments which are to be imposed upon the processors of certain farm products in the pending farm relief bill as "taxes" or "a tax." Professor Kemmerer condemns these as contravening "most of the fundamental canons of justice in taxation."

Inasmuch as these assessments are not a tax, the appeal to the proper canons of taxation is wholly irrelevant. A tax is a levy by government for the support of government. The assessments stipulated in the farm relief bill, the greater part of which will undoubtedly be passed on to the consumer, are imposed and will be collected by the Government indeed, but they will not be devoted to the support of government. Since they are intended to provide higher prices for the farmers, they are properly classified under the head of price fixing. To call this levy a tax tends to give it a bad name and would cause it to be prejudged, just as many reform measures have been injured by calling them socialistic. The proposal ought to be considered on its merits. What it does, not what it may be called, is the vital consideration.

It is indeed a price-raising measure for the benefit of one class of citizens at the expense of another class. Nevertheless, the emphasis upon class legislation in the discussion of it is irrelevant to the question of justice. In the interest of realism as well as fairness the laissez-faire condemnation of class legislation as such should be totally discarded. As a matter of fact, the vast majority of important enactments, whether by Congress or by the State legislatures, are and must be class legislation in the sense that they all benefit some classes more than others. The principle underlying this practice is the only one that is just in a society with different class needs and class interests. The "general citizen" does not exist any more than "the economic man" who was excogitated by Professor Kemmerer's predecessors of the classical school of economics.

CANONS OF TAXATION

Class legislation provides the only method for effectuating distributive justice, the formulation of which is: "Burdens according to capacities, benefits according to needs." The canons of taxation to which Professor Kemmerer rightly appeals are in accord with the first part of this formula. The second part is even more important, and it not only justifies but requires legislation which varies according to the interests and needs of the various social classes. As applied to governmental functions, the principle was never more aptly expressed than by Pope Leo XIII: "Whenever the general interest or any particular class suffers or is threatened with evil which can in no other way be avoided, it is the duty of the public authority to intervene."

Professor Kemmerer emphasizes the increased cost of food products which will result to the great majority of the population for the sake of a minority. This, too, is irrelevant. The only relevant question that can be raised concerning the justice of the price-determining provisions of the farm relief bill is whether they are fair to both producers and consumers. The farmers have a valid ethical claim to prices sufficiently high to enable them to live decently. Conversely, the consumers are under ethical obligation to provide such prices on all the farm commodities that they actually consume. When they demand goods at a lower price they are unreasonable and unjust.

Do the prices contemplated in the farm relief bill provide more than a decent livelihood for the farmers? Professor Kemmerer intimates that they are arbitrary, inasmuch as they aim at restoring the relative purchasing power enjoyed by the farmers in the years 1909–14. Possibly this is an "arbitrary" standard, but it can scarcely be called exorbitant or unjust in view of the enormous burden of debt and the desperate situation created by wholesale mortgage foreclosures. The level of prices contemplated in the bill will not give the vast majority of farmers an excessive income for many years.

THE QUESTION OF FAIR PRICES

The general failure to recognize this ethical principle of fair prices to the farmers and the ethical obligation upon consumers to pay such prices has been one of the most discouraging features of the discussion of the domestic-allotment plan and every other plan for lifting agricultural prices from their present unjustly low levels. Almost all the critics of these proposals seem to assume that whatever price is fixed by supply and demand is a just price. While Professor Kemmerer does not in his article expressly accept this assumption, neither does he deny it, and his whole argument tends to lend it support. This is another laissez-faire assumption that has been long overdue for the discard. It is high time for the universal acceptance and preaching of the doctrine that every economic class in our abundantly rich American productive society whose products or services are required by society has a moral right to at least the elements of decent living and that those who consume those products or services have a moral obligation to provide the money equivalent of such a standard of living.

Undoubtedly the administrative difficulties involved in this part of the farm relief bill are very great. Possibly they are insoluble. The only way to ascertain the truth in this matter is by actual experiment, as President Roosevelt has frankly admitted. But experimentation, no matter how formidable, is preferable to continuation of the present intolerable conditions in our agricultural industry.

JOHN A. RYAN.

WASHINGTON, D.C., April 4, 1933.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 13, after the word "upon", to insert "not in excess of the market price", so as to read:

SEC. 3. The Federal Farm Board and all departments and other agencies of the Government are hereby directed—

(a) To sell to the Secretary of Agriculture at such price as may be agreed upon, not in excess of the market price, all cotton now owned by them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina will recall that when a similar bill was before the Senate at a previous time I offered an amendment as a substitute for subsections (a) and (b), which I now desire to offer. The proposed new sections as I offered them would read:

(a) To take such action and to make such settlements as are necessary in order to acquire full legal title to all cotton on which money has been loaned or advanced by them upon such terms as they may deem fair and just: Provided, That no amount in excess of outstanding advances to individual producers and charges paid or accrued for storage, transportation, insurance, and interest against the cotton so acquired shall be allowed by the Farm Board in such settlement: Provided further, That if the amount of such advances and charges on the actual cotton so acquired cannot be determined, no amount in excess of the market value of the cotton shall be allowed by the Farm Board except that it may cancel such part of any loan or advance, and only such part, as it ascertains to be not recoverable from the borrower.

(b) To sell to the said Board at such price, not exceeding the market price, as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture all cotton now owned by them or acquired by them under the provisions of section (a).

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, exactly the same principle is involved in the two amendments, first, the one on line 13, page 3, where we propose to insert the words "not in excess of the market price"; that is, the market price at the time the settlement is made. The next one is where we propose to insert the words, "In making such settlements the cotton shall be taken over at prices equal to the amounts loaned or advanced, directly or indirectly, plus the carrying charges and operating costs thereon. The Department or other agency shall," and so forth. That includes practically what the Senator had in his amendment.

Parties interested in the bill have stated that if it were agreeable they would like to have this particular amendment go over for a time, until the new Secretary and parties interested might reach an agreement, and I promised that I would make that request.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if I may, I will just offer the amendment I have read as a substitute for the two provisions, and allow it to remain in that way and to go over, if the Senator desires that it go over.

Mr. SMITH. As an amendment is being prepared which will be agreeable to the new Secretary, I would just ask for this to go over, and we can recur to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. With the understanding that the amendment is offered?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator asks that his amendment go over?

Mr. McKELLAR. That will be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from South Carolina, he will recall that following the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Tennessee when the so-called "Smith cotton bill" was under consideration at the last session of Congress, I offered an amendment which was adopted without any opposition. If I may read it, I shall offer the amendment now and ask that it be accorded the same treatement as that accorded to the amendment just offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. President, I offer the following amendment, to follow the amendment just offered by the Senator from Tennessee, to be marked "(c)":

That in making such settlements the Farm Board shall, before allowing any credits to any organization or subsidiary to which it has loaned money, obtain a transfer of all assets of every kind, character, and description owned, held, or possessed by it, and the value of such assets so transferred may by said Farm Board be credited upon any amount due it from said debtor organization or subsidiary.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I state, in that connection, that the cooperative organizations, through authority granted them by the Farm Board, were placed in almost exactly the same relation to the Farm Board which the stabilization corporation bore, to wit, they were authorized to pay within 10 percent of the market value of cotton which they financed. In other words, the Farm Board advanced them 90 percent of the market value of the cotton, they assuming, naturally, the chance of loss or gain. The cotton was predicated on that basis. Loss was sustained, because at that time the members of the cooperative organizations, which the bill was then, and the administration is now, seeking to build up, were given every opportunity to benefit by cooperative action. The cotton was very low. They were then offered, as I said a moment ago, within 90 percent of the market price. Each member could at that time, had he so desired, have gotten more for it than he subsequently could have gotten. But the Farm Board advanced this money to these cooperatives, just as it did to the stabilization corporation, for the purpose of aiding, as far as the cotton held by the cooperatives was concerned, in stabilizing the market, in conjunction with the cotton which the stabilization corporation was holding. All of that was done in the hope that, by holding that amount of cotton from the market, and advancing within 10 percent of its market value, benefit would result to the cotton grower, especially to the cooperative, in an advanced crop.

The depression kept on, not alone because of the action of the cooperatives or the stabilization corporation but the same influences which have practically ruined the market price of every commodity of America. They suffered a loss. Now the cooperatives are asking the Farm Board to extend to them the same legal status—they certainly have the same moral status—in reference to the money loaned them, to hold this cotton, that was extended to the stabilization corporation. Therefore they are attempting now so to adjust matters as not to put every cooperative out of existence but to settle upon a basis that is equitable and just in view of the facts I have just stated.

It now remains for the Senate to determine whether or not, regardless of what the assets may be, other than the cotton that was hypothecated by the Farm Board and the loan that was extended, we shall go farther than that. I unhesitatingly believe that the money loaned to these cooperatives to hold this cotton for the 3-year period was made by the Farm Board under the same idea and for the same purpose which were behind the loan to the stabilization corporation. All of us know the effect of the depression.

Mr. President, it is a question whether we should take now not only the cotton which is still held as bona fide collateral against the loan made but also to take what other assets they have, and the other property they may have, in settlement of the loss that was sustained in good faith on their part and good faith on the part of the Farm Board. I do not think we are justified in going beyond the terms of settlement proposed, namely, to write off the loss sustained in the amount of money the Farm Board loaned and the amount these private corporations have loaned. The cotton will amply take care of that. So far as the money borrowed from private corporations is concerned, I am informed that the present market price would just about take care of the overhead and the amount, comparatively small, that has been borrowed from private corporations. That is what this amendment undertakes to do.

As a matter of course, if Congress wants to abolish all the cooperatives, to put them out of existence, let them start de novo, it can accept the amendment, take all the assets they have, whether pledged or not, whether even contemplated in this trade or not. If they desire to do that, as a matter of course it is up to Congress to do it. But if they desire to write off the loss that was inevitable, not only have they lost, but the taxpayers throughout the United States have lost, the Government has lost. We cannot balance our Budget. We have not the commodities to be taxed or those which can bear taxes in sufficient quantity to meet the expenditures of our Government without cutting down the salaries of those who are employed by the Government, and the soldiers, and going still farther. We are now, at the expense of the taxpayer, setting up forestry camps and offering so much a month to those who cannot live unless the Government does appropriate the money to sustain them. It is a condition unprecedented, and we should not deal with it as though it were the result of a sinister and reprehensible purpose on the part of anybody.

Mr. President, I have worked with the cooperatives; I am a member of a cotton cooperative organization. They have made egregious mistakes, and if the present condition of affairs in the United States is to be charged to mistakes, then the Government should be held to its responsibility, for it has made colossal mistakes.

Mr. President, I claim that we should deal justly with the Government and its instrumentalities, looking toward providing aid for the distressed people of the country. The Farm Board in its operations was a failure largely because of conditions over which it and nobody else held any control, and largely because of incompetency and, perhaps, worse. I am not here with any brief for that organization; but I do state that had conditions been normal and the depression had not occurred, the failure of the Farm Board would not, perhaps, have been so egregious.

I claim that the farmers who have banded themselves together in cooperative organizations, under the inspiration and under the protection of the Government, have a right to come here and say, "Here is the commodity that we hypothecated for a loan, and in good faith we have held it for 3 years; the loss has been tremendous so far as cotton is concerned, and now we want to settle; we want to get the Government free of this quantity of cotton, both in the stabilization corporation and in the cooperatives." We went so far in the stabilization corporation, which was more directly the property of the Government, to make a gift to to the Red Cross of practically all the wheat and all the cotton, and to charge it off to profit and loss. Why should we deal differently with these people who in good faith were loaned money by the Farm Board for identically the same purpose for which it was loaned to the stabilization corporation, the difference being that the cooperatives have some other property, while the stabilization corporation has no other property? The direct purpose was, under the inspiration and under the text of the farm loan bill, to buy sufficient quantities of these staple products as, in their judgment, would stabilize the price. They fondly hoped that the purchases would have that result, and so they bought many million bushels of wheat and many million bushels of cotton; but, instead of stabilizing the price, nothing could stand the horrible avalanche of the depression. That was inevitable; and, in consequence, they went down as everything else went down, as the banks went down, as the farmers went down, as the incomes of the people of the United States went down.

Now let us in justice and in statesmanship and fair dealing deal with these people in accordance with the condition in which they find themselves. I think they are entitled to consideration. Every one of them has lost money. There is not a farmer who put his tobacco in a cooperative organization, or his cotton or his wheat, but who lost the difference between what he could have obtained then and what it is worth now; but he loyally and heroically went in and took 90 percent, in the selfish hope, of course, that, with the backing of the Government and the cooperation of enough of those engaged in the business, prices would be reflected to his advantage. They were not and the crash came. Now it is up to the Senate to decide whether or not they will go back on the collateral required by the Farm Board for the money that was advanced on this cotton, or whether they will take all the assets that the cooperatives have and require them to start de novo.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in my opinion the statement made by the Senator from South Carolina rests upon some assumed facts, the existence of which I do not concede. There was considerable discussion of this subject when the so-called "Smith cotton bill" was before the Senate a few weeks ago. At that time I called attention to some of the testimony appearing in the so-called "Shannon report", which revealed a situation different from that, if I understand my friend, depicted by him.

First, let me read a letter which I received this morning bearing upon this amendment. I may say before doing so that when the Smith cotton bill was under discussion, after tendering to that bill the amendment which I have now submitted, it was accepted because the Senate believed that it was just and entirely warranted by the facts presented. We had a discussion about it later after the conferees had eliminated the amendment and the bill was sent back to conference, where a compromise measure was agreed upon which in part met the requirements of the amendment which I had offered. The letter in part states:

Within this Smith bill inclusion there is a provision whereby the chairman of the Farm Board and the Secretary of Agriculture may cancel the now $71,000,000 of debts the cotton cooperatives owe the Farm Board at his discretion.

At the time the Smith bill was originally introduced as a separate proposition it was virtually understood that, without your and Senator McKELLAR's amendments to the section 2 (b), the Farm Board would cancel the debt and would leave the cooperatives with the profits they have segregated as a result of the operations which caused the debts.

I interpolate at this point that the facts, as I recall them, demonstrated that the so-called cooperative association, known as the A.C.C.A., controlled if not organized by Mr. Creekmore, whose compensation was $75,000 a year, is the chief beneficiary of the speculations and transactions of the association referred to.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator wants to be accurate.

Mr. KING. I do.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Creekmore did not organize a cooperative.

Mr. KING. I did not mean to convey the idea that the cooperatives were organized by Mr. Creekmore, but that the A.C.C. Association was controlled if not organized by him.

Mr. SMITH. I thought the Senator said "cooperative."

Mr. KING. No; the Senator misunderstood me. I repeat that the A.C.C., the cotton association, not the cooperatives to which the Senator refers, was organized largely under the influence of Mr. Creekmore, and this association was and is the instrumentality by which the Farm Board and the Stabilization Corporation were brought into contact with the cooperatives to which my friend refers.

The evidence showed, as I recall, that it is this A.C.C. Association, the Creekmore association, that has profited to the extent of millions of dollars which it is planned to withhold, instead of having the same covered into the treasury of the Farm Board in order to lighten the burden resting upon the American people. After a full explanation of the facts the Senate accepted my amendment and insisted that those assets should be covered into the treasury of the Farm Board and be used for the purpose of diminishing the enormous losses of between three hundred and fifty and four hundred million dollars incurred through the unwise operations of the Farm Board. But to return to the letter:

Therefore, despite the fact that the same wording was used in incorporating the Smith bill into the present emergency bill, insofar as the debt-paying-up section is concerned, these cooperatives, today, secured an additional amendment making it mandatory that the chairman of the board, in settling up their debts, leave them with the capital they have laid aside as a result of the operations causing the debts and, in addition, the chairman should pay all costs, operating charges and other debts in connection with the obligation.

In other words, while they are asking the country to have great faith in the Secretary of Agriculture and the President in allowing such a bill to pass, they are seeing to it that a specific, definite provision is being included to enable them to get their salaries and to salt away the profits which would not have been possible had there been no debt.

The reason for this is, to my mind, not hard to see. If the cooperatives can come into this new picture, following the passage of the emergency bill, with no losses, no entanglements, a nice fat capital plucked out of thin air, they will have no alibis and nothing to explain. They would be in position to point with pride and to urge that all the functions of the bill having to do with leasing land, distribution of benefits, and so on be turned over to this successful, fully capitalized, going concern.

Quite the contrary will be true if this raid is not permitted. They will have to disclose their record of extravagance of speculation and of using every quack method of doing business under the sun.

My thought as to the proper amendment to cover this particular section of the Smith bill would be about—

I have not offered this amendment. I have offered the one which I presented when the Smith bill was under consideration several weeks ago.

This is the amendment suggested by the writer of the letter:

Provided, That in making such settlements with subsidiaries which owe the Farm Board money, against stocks of cotton or other commodities held, or otherwise, application of such profits, margins, brokerages, or capital as were made or set aside as a result of the operations which caused the indebtedness shall be made in partial retirement of the debt, by such subsidiaries.

Mr. President, in brief, but speaking now with rather an indistinct recollection of the facts as they were developed by the Shannon committee and other data which were presented to the Senate directly and indirectly when the Smith bill was under consideration a few of the facts are as follows: The Farm Board used a large part of $500,000,000 for the purpose of speculating in wheat and cotton. It turned over to a stabilization corporation, which it caused to be organized, a very large sum, more than a hundred or a hundred and fifty million dollars for speculation in cotton. The stabilization corporation caused to be organized the A.C.C.A. with the high-salaried Mr. Creekmore at the head, and, acting, of course, under the direction of the Farm Board or with its connivance and approval and the connivance and approval of the Stabilization Corporation, the A.C.C.A. formed contacts with the cooperatives in the South.

I may say in passing, and by way of parenthesis, that my understanding is that most of such cooperatives are bankrupt, but the A.C.C.A. of Mr. Creekmore purchased from these so-called "cooperatives" large quantities of cotton at prices considerably in excess of the market price, with the understanding that if a larger sum could be finally obtained, the cooperatives were to receive an additional price for the cotton. Of course, with the speculation that was going on and the faulty and unsound policies and methods of the Farm Board and its ancillary organizations, cotton was bound to go down, as it did go down.

The A.C.C.A., through its speculations, through the operations to which I have so imperfectly referred, made considerable money, and now has assets of considerable value, which I am seeking to have recaptured and in the settlement not to transfer them to the A.C.C.A. or any of the cooperatives if they claim an interest therein. These assets should be covered into the Treasury of the United States in order that the enormous losses, amounting to tens of millions of dollars, resulting from the unsound and unwise policies and practices of the Farm Board and its agencies may be used in diminishing the burdens placed upon the taxpayers by reason of such losses.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator made a mistake about the losses on cotton. My recollection is that the figures relative to cotton showed losses of $71,000,000. The remainder on other products, but $71,000,000 was on cotton.

Mr. KING. The Senator is in error. It was $63,000,000 in one department, if I may use that expression, and $83,000,000 in another. When we come to consider the motion which I have submitted I shall be glad to elaborate on the matter. I ask that the amendment may go over in pursuance of the understanding which was reached a few moments ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to have the privilege at this point of having printed in the RECORD a communication on this subject from Mrs. Gertrude Mathews Shelby, of New York, who has taken a great interest in cooperative banking, and so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

NATIONAL COMMITTEE FOR COOPERATIVE BANKS,
New York, April 7, 1933.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: Approving of the refinancing features of the administration's farm mortgage bill and also the voluntary liquidation of the joint-stock land banks, I am compelled, for basic reasons, to register protest against the features of the measure which affect the Federal land banks.

Cooperative ownership of this mortgage system is a farce without actual cooperative management and determination of all policies. Therefore, in view of proven dangers, I recommend that appropriate steps be taken now to put the land banks on the same basis of Government ownership as the intermediate-credit banks.

In my opinion, the administration itself should sponsor amendments to the farm mortgage bill or the Farm Loan Act itself providing for the purchase by the Government of outstanding land-bank stock.

Not a penny in cash is needed for this transaction. The amount of each farmer-borrower's stock can be credited against his amortization and interest payments. If the borrower is in arrears, this relief will, by a mere bookkeeping transaction, turn his stock into a realizable asset, automatic extension of the time he has to save his farm from foreclosure. If the borrower is not in arrears, he has proved himself the sort of farmer who deserves a boost in depression.

Recapitalization of the 12 land banks may be authorized by slight amendment to title I, section 1, relating to the proposed bond issue, or by recourse to Reconstruction Finance funds.

The present proposal is palpably unjust to the present and future farmer-stockholders of the system. To loan upon them cooperative liabilities when they lack actual control is inequitable. The management of the system is vested in the Farm Loan Commissioner, responsible to Congress, not to the actual owners. Land-bank presidents have never been representative of the minority of the land-bank boards who are stockholders, and these presidents are in turn accountable to the Commissioner, whose policies they carry out. Divided responsibility of the system is, I believe, a major cause of large loss.

The semipublic character of this system has in the past prevented the monthly routine Treasury Department audit of farm-loan accounts. Because the system was "privately owned", Congress, while availing itself of its political patronage, has seldom exerted corrective influence regarding its fiscal policy or management.

The Government itself is actually responsible for present losses and likewise for future losses, if any. While farm-loan associations might still be required to endorse all applications for loans, the Government should, I urge, relieve them from the intolerable position in which stockholders and associations have been placed; i.e., it should purchase all outstanding stock. Otherwise, sooner or later, farmers are more than likely to find themselves the victims of attempted Federal relief.

Sincerely,

GERTRUDE MATHEWS SHELBY,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, was the amendment on page 3 passed over by unanimous consent?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; the amendment at the bottom of page 3 went over.

Mr. McNARY. Both of the amendments there?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; both of them went over.

Mr. McKELLAR. There was a substitute offered for each of them.

Mr. SMITH. They were passed over and will be taken up later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 6, line 12, to strike out the heading "Title II—Agricultural adjustment provisions", and insert "Part 2—Commodity benefits."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 22, after the word "therewith", to insert "or upon that part of the production of any basic agricultural commodity required for domestic consumption", so as to read:

GENERAL POWERS

SEC. 8. In order to effectuate the declared policy, the Secretary of Agriculture shall have power—

(1) To provide for reduction in the acreage or reduction in the production for market, or both, of any basic agricultural commodity, through agreements with producers or by other voluntary methods, and to provide for rental or benefit payments in connection therewith or upon that part of the production of any basic agricultural commodity required for domestic consumption, in such amounts as the Secretary deems fair and reasonable, to be paid out of any moneys available for such payments.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, is that the amendment on page 6, lines 22, 23, and 24?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. That reduces the domestic-allotment benefits?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment, but I have not had time to perfect it. I have no objection to the amendment's being adopted, if that is the will of the Senate, with the understanding that we may recur to it if I shall conclude later to offer my amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. SMITH. My understanding is that after committee amendments have been considered, then other amendments can be offered from the floor.

Mr. KING. The Senator would have no objection then?

Mr. SMITH. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the committee is agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 7, line 4, after the word "and", to strike out "other agencies" and insert "others"; and in line 13, after the word "agreements", to strike out "and shall bear interest at a rate not in excess of 3 per centum per annum", so as to read:

(2) To enter into marketing agreements with processors, associations of producers, and others engaged in the handling, in the current of interstate or foreign commerce of any agricultural commodity or product thereof, after due notice and opportunity for hearing to interested parties. For the purpose of carrying out any such agreement the parties thereto shall be eligible for loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act. Such loans shall not be in excess of such amounts as may be authorized by the agreements.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 16, after the word "and", to strike out "other agencies" and insert "others"; in line 19, after the word "competing", to strike out "agricultural"; on page 8, line 5, after the word "thereof" and the period, to insert "Any order of the Secretary suspending or revoking any such license shall be final if in accordance with law"; and in line 7, after the word "Any", to strike out "agency" and insert "such person", so as to read:

(3) To issue licenses permitting processors, associations of producers, and others to engage in the handling, in the current of interstate or foreign commerce, of any basic agricultural commodity or product thereof, or any competing commodity or product thereof. Such licenses shall be subject to such terms and conditions, not in conflict with existing acts of Congress or regulations pursuant thereto, as may be necessary to eliminate unfair practices or charges that prevent or tend to prevent the effectuation of the declared policy and the restoration of normal economic conditions in the marketing of such commodities or products and the financing thereof. The Secretary of Agriculture may suspend or revoke any such license, after due notice and opportunity for hearing, for violations of the terms or conditions thereof. Any order of the Secretary suspending or revoking any such license shall be final if in accordance with law. Any such person engaged in such handling without a license as required by the Secretary under this section shall be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000 for each day during which the violation continues.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question with reference to the amendment just adopted in line 19, page 7, to strike out the word "agriculture." Why was the amendment proposed?

Mr. SMITH. It was brought to the attention of the committee that other commodities, those synthetically produced, might be used in place of agricultural commodities and thereby decrease the consumption of agricultural commodities.

Mr. FESS. By striking out the word "agriculture" the scope of the application of the language is increased?

Mr. SMITH. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the committee is agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 8, line 17, after the word "of", to strike out "This act" and insert "part 2 of this title", so as to read:

(4) To require any licensee under this section to furnish such reports as to quantities of agricultural commodities or products thereof bought and sold and the prices thereof, and as to trade practices and charges, and to keep such systems of accounts as may be necessary for the purpose of part 2 of this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Processing Tax", on page 8, after line 18, to strike out:

SEC. 9. (a) To raise revenues for the payment of extraordinary expenses incurred by reason of the national economic emergency there shall be levied, assessed, and collected during the marketing period (as ascertained and prescribed by regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture) for any basic agricultural commodity with respect to which rental or benefit payments are made under this act, in connection with reductions in the acreage of the crop, or in the production for market during such period a tax to be paid by the processor on the first domestic processing of the commodity, whether of domestic production or imported. Such tax shall, except as hereinafter provided, equal the difference between the current average farm price for the commodity and the fair exchange value of the commodity. Such value for any commodity shall be the price therefor which will give the commodity the same purchasing power, with respect to articles farmers buy, as during the pre-war period, August 1909–July 1914. The current average farm price and the fair exchange value shall be ascertained by the Secretary of Agriculture from available statistics of the Department of Agriculture.

(b) If the Secretary of Agriculture, after investigation and due notice and opportunity for hearing to interested parties, finds at any time that the imposition of the tax at the rate hereinbefore provided has resulted or is likely to result in a substantial reduction in the quantity of the commodity or products thereof domestically consumed, he shall fix such lower rate as is necessary to maintain or restore such domestic consumption. Such rate may be revised from time to time pursuant to further findings under this subsection. In making any such finding the Secretary shall give due consideration to the following factors among others:

(1) Reports as to wage scales, employment, and unemployment in urban regions.

(2) Changes in the consumption of the agricultural commodity and of other commodities.

(3) Evidence derived from statistical studies of supply and demand for previous periods, which indicate the change in consumption of the commodity which would normally occur in consequence of a particular change in the cost to processors or consumers.

(4) Other relevant data as to changes in the cost of living of consumers, consumers' buying habits, and current and prospective conditions in industry pertinent to determining the probable effective demand for the commodity.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 9. (a) To obtain revenue for extraordinary expenses incurred by reason of the existing national economic emergency, including expenditures for rental and benefit payments and administrative expenses under this title, there shall be levied processing taxes as hereinafter provided. The processing tax with respect to any basic agricultural commodity shall commence on the date of proclamation by the Secretary of Agriculture that rental or benefit payments are to be made with respect to such commodity. The processing tax shall be levied, assessed, and collected upon the first domestic processing of the commodity, whether of domestic production or imported, and shall be paid by the processor. The rate of tax shall conform to the requirements of subsection (b). Such rate shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture as of the date the tax first takes effect, and the rate so determined shall, at such intervals as the Secretary finds necessary to effectuate the declared policy, be adjusted by him to conform to such requirements. The processing tax shall terminate at the end of the marketing year current at the time the Secretary proclaims that rental or benefit payments are to be discontinued with respect to such commodity. The marketing year for each commodity shall be ascertained and prescribed by regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture.

(b) The processing tax shall be at such rate as equals the difference between the current average farm price for the commodity and the fair exchange value of the commodity, except that if the Secretary has reason to believe that the tax at such rate will cause such reduction in the quantity of the commodity or products thereof domestically consumed as to result in the accumulation of surplus stocks of the commodity or products thereof or in the depression of the farm price of the commodity, then he shall cause an appropriate investigation to be made and afford due notice and opportunity for hearing to interested parties. If thereupon the Secretary finds that such result will occur, then the processing tax shall be at such rate as will prevent such accumulation of surplus stocks and depression of the farm price of the commodity.

(c) For the purposes of part 2 of this title, the fair exchange value of a commodity shall be the price therefor that will give the commodity the same purchasing power, with respect to articles farmers buy, as such commodity had during the base period specified in section 2; and the current average farm price and the fair exchange value shall be ascertained by the Secretary of Agriculture from available statistics of the Department of Agriculture.

(d) As used in part 2 of this title—

(1) In case of wheat, rice, and corn, the term "processing" means the milling or other processing (except cleaning and drying) of wheat, rice, or corn for market, including custom milling for toll as well as commercial milling, but shall not include the grinding or cracking thereof not in the form of flour for feed purposes only.

(2) In case of cotton, the term "processing" means the spinning, manufacturing, or other processing (except ginning) of cotton; and the term "cotton" shall not include cotton linters.

(3) In case of tobacco, the term "processing" means the manufacturing or other processing (except drying) of tobacco.

(4) In case of hogs, the term "processing" means the slaughter of hogs for market.

(5) In the case of any other commodity, the term "processing" means any manufacturing or other processing involving a change in the form of the commodity or its preparation for market, as defined by regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture; and in prescribing such regulations the Secretary shall give due weight to the customs of the industry.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I want to make an inquiry of the Senator from South Carolina in reference to the first line of section 9. It seems to leave the money raised by this tax to be applicable not only to the purposes of the bill but to any extraordinary expenses due to the national economic emergency. In other words, moneys raised through the processing tax apparently could be applied to reforestation or any other extraordinary expenses. I am wondering why that wide authority is given.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have no explanation to give other than that it was stated by those who drafted the bill and presented it to the Congress that these taxes were to be devoted entirely to the purposes of the bill. However, I think that further on in the text there is more specific language in reference to the disposition and use of the taxes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina will pardon me, I think that if there is any question about the purpose to limit the use of the funds acquired under the bill to the purposes of the bill, it could be very easily restricted in that way by a slight modification which would eliminate the words to which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] has referred. It is my understanding, I will say to the Senator from South Carolina, that there is no intention to raise funds by a processing tax to be used for purposes outside the provisions of the bill.

Mr. SMITH. May I invite the Senator's attention to the fact that in the declaration of policy it is asserted to be the purpose of the bill so to collect these funds as to give a bonus or raise the price of the commodities thus taxed to the parity that existed during the base period. It is also provided that when this result shall have been attained, then no further tax shall be applied, so that without any specific language devoting the tax to specific purposes, I think in the declaration of policy, and also in the limitation of the time that the tax may be applied, it is clearly inferrable that that is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. By striking out the words "by reason of the existing national economic emergency" and inserting in lieu thereof "under this title", the object which the Senator from Colorado has in mind would be accomplished. I do not see any objection to doing that. I would suggest, on page 10, line 15, to strike out the words "by reason of the existing national economic emergency" and insert the words "under this title." The object of the language was to explain the imposition of the tax.

Mr. ADAMS. As it is a tax on consumers, it ought to be limited, as the Senator from Arkansas has suggested, so that by no possible chance it could be devoted to any other purpose.

Mr. SMITH. Let me read it, Mr. President, as it would then appear:

To obtain revenue for extraordinary expenses incurred under this title, including expenditures for rental and benefit payments and administrative expenses under this title, there shall be levied processing taxes as hereinafter provided.

That would strike out the words "by reason of the existing national economic emergency." I will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in the text of the bill as passed by the House, subdivision (b), on page 9, came to the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Before the committee I urged the lack of wisdom of this subdivision. If that subdivision is carried into the statute, I think it will prevent all future dealings in the commercial avenues of trade that are now found profitable to the grower and to the dealer. It certainly would interfere if not wholly dispense with trading in futures. That provision, after consideration by the committee for more than a day, went out by a vote.

The substitute which is found on page 11, subdivision (b), in my opinion, contains all the vices that are contained in the provision stricken out.

After the committee struck that provision out of the bill this language was prepared by the able leader of the majority, I think in collaboration with the Secretary of Agriculture. Some of the specifications on page 10 that were found offensive were eliminated; but I predict that that language, in the form in which it is now presented by the committee, renders the price level of all commodities so uncertain, it places in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture such tremendous arbitrary power to decrease prices, that it will prevent dealing in the customary channels of trade as now recognized by the business world. In other words, if the Secretary of Agriculture, under that provision, after an investigation and due notice—which, in my opinion, means nothing—should determine that surplus stocks are accumulating by virtue of an increased or enhanced price level, he may arbitrarily, by his own edict, lower that price level.

I find no comfort in the language that it will be after due hearing to the interested parties. I know that is a legal phrase—"due notice * * * to interested parties." That is all right in a partition suit in equity. It is all right in an injunction proceeding, or in the foreclosure of a mortgage, where the parties are limited in number and are accessible. But suppose we find that in increasing the price of wheat to the parity price in the base period of 1909 it is necessary to add 40 cents a bushel to wheat in order to give the farmer the benefit contemplated by this allotment provision, and stocks of flour and wheat should accumulate, bread sales were not as plentiful as formerly, and people were denying themselves the products of wheat—under this provision the Secretary of Agriculture, in order to prevent the further accumulation of these surpluses so that wheat and flour would move in their normal channels, could arbitrarily reduce the price of wheat 10 cents or 20 cents a bushel. When I say that I mean he could do it through the processing tax, which is intimately associated with the amount the consumer must pay for his wheat or flour.

The bill provides that that may be done after "due notice and opportunity for hearing." There are 2,200,000 farmers engaged in growing wheat in this country. There are four and a half million farmers engaged in growing the products that are enumerated and specified in this bill. How could we operate intelligently, Mr. President, by notifying this vast number of people that the price level of their product is going to be decreased or increased? It is perfectly impossible. It is unthinkable. It is impracticable.

The vice of that, Mr. President, is that if the miller wants to buy a million bushels of wheat for the purpose of hedging; if he wants to deal in futures to the extent of 10,000,000 bushels, which is a matter of insurance to him; if the exporter wants to sell millions of bushels to Europe or to the Orient, and he knows that in the very bill dealing with this subject matter the Secretary of Agriculture, upon his own edict, may change the price of wheat or any other commodity, he certainly would not take a chance on buying wheat at one price today and selling it at another price tomorrow. It is peculiarly so with respect to corn, cotton, and hogs.

For that reason, Mr. President, after due reflection, the committee struck out that language upon a motion that I made. Later on, the new amendment which is now in the bill as a substitute appeared. It omits some of the specifications set forth on page 10, but in its very folds, in its very bosom, it contains all of the vices set forth in the original proposition which was voted out by the Senate committee.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. This means that the processing tax, as a whole, will be stricken out, does it? If not, what does it mean?

Mr. McNARY. The processing tax, as the Senator knows, is the difference between the average current value and the buying power of the farmers' commodity in the base period 1909 to 1914. As to hogs, it would be 7½ cents a pound; as to wheat, it would be 94 cents a bushel; as to cotton, it would be about 11½ cents a pound. If that price is fixed, which is done by this bill, and the Secretary of Agriculture, after investigation, determines that stocks are accumulating because of the enhanced value of the production, which brings about a diminution in the consumption, he then can decrease the tax on the product so that it will come to the consumer at a lower rate, so that stocks will not further pile up.

There is this virtue about it: Everything has some decent aspects when we look at it fairly. The whole thought back of this proposition in the bill is that it may protect the consumer from paying an inordinate price for the product which he buys. Let me use the illustration of hogs. The price during the base period, plus the current average price, will bring hogs to 7½ cents a pound—a pretty fair price for hogs. Pork is the poor man's meat. If it is increased, as it is, by 100 percent, and the Secretary of Agriculture finds that the carcasses of hogs are accumulating in the packers' warehouses, that lard is not moving, that only the byproducts which go into chemicals and cosmetics are being used, he then can reduce, after due notice and investigation, the tax on hogs—which we may call the sales tax or the processing tax—and bring the price down to 5½ cents.

I am a hog buyer. I am a feeder and a buyer. I am not going to pay 7½ cents a pound for 10,000 hogs when I know that the Secretary in 30 days can decrease that price to 5½ cents.

The only reason why that is in the bill is to protect the consumer; but in protecting the consumer to that extent, in my opinion, we are going to dry up the channels of commerce. As one who is not fighting this bill, as one who is wholly desirous of getting as good a bill as possible, from an earnest conviction from studying the problem for a number of years, I think it is a mistake to carry this provision in the bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as I understand, then, the Senator is trying to strike out this provision.

Mr. McNARY. May I say to my friend from Louisiana that I am not moving to strike it out. I am just pointing out that that which was stricken out contained the vices which now I am inveighing against. That which has been substituted, in my opinion, contains the same vices and ills, and I am sorry to see it in the bill. At the proper time I probably shall move to eliminate it from the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the question raised by the Senator from Oregon relates to one of the controversial provisions of the bill. It unquestionably presents difficulties that demand and require consideration.

Let me point out the fact that to authorize the imposition of a tax, with no power to change that tax, might result in making the practical results of the measure scarcely worth while.

I agree that there ought not to be such flexibility as will enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make arbitrary changes—changes that would interfere with the trade—but if the facts set up in this subsection appear to be true, the continued imposition of the tax without change would work harm not only to the consumer but to the farmer himself. The object of the provision is to protect both the consumer and the farmer.

Conceivably, a tax in the beginning might be made so high that stocks would greatly accumulate, with the result that prices, instead of rising, would be depressed. If that were true, harm would result to both consumer and producer, and there ought to be the power to make a change.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. NORBECK. The point the Senator is making is that if the officials of the Government find they have made a mistake, they should have the power to correct it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Why, certainly.

Mr. NORBECK. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I thank the Senator. He has stated the matter in just a few words. For instance, the Secretary of Agriculture might make a mistake. There are some here who think that he will. If he does make a mistake, and the mistake is proving detrimental to the successful operation of the bill, he ought to have the power to correct his mistake and put into effect a different rate. Experience might show, or changed conditions might indicate, necessity for a change.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly it will not be said by anyone that the Secretary of Agriculture would intentionally try to depress the price of any farm commodity against the interest of the farmer.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. This section, as the Senator from Oregon has stated, has received protracted consideration by committees and students of the subject. As he has said, I myself drafted a provision to which there was no objection save that it did not give that flexibility that is believed to be necessary.

I think it is going to be found that if we really desire to make this act accomplish its purpose, if we wish to leave it so that those who are to administer it are to have the power to do what it is intended the act shall do, we must of necessity retain this or some similar provision.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Arkansas a question? The point that I was attempting to make was this: I appreciate why the provision is there, of course. It is to cure any mistakes that may have been made in estimating the value of the product. Does not the Senator realize, however, the merit in the statement I made that it makes the price level so uncertain as probably greatly to interfere with the dealing in the ordinary channels of commerce? Does not the Senator entertain that fear?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; I do not think that would result. Of course, there is a measure of uncertainty about the price level. That is one of the difficulties to which the bill is directed; but I think it is essential that some power be vested in the administrator to revise the tax. I do not think it should be done arbitrarily or recklessly, but only in the case set forth in the bill could it be done; that is, where the effect of the tax is to accumulate stocks in such an amount as to result in depressing rather than raising the price. Then certainly all of us who believe in legislation of this character, or in any legislation designed to aid agricultural commodity prices, ought to be willing to give him the power to make the change.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I merely want to suggest that the price level could not be any more uncertain under this provision than it has been during the last 3½ years.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has expressed my thought very accurately.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, it is true, as has been stated, that this provision had very careful consideration in the committee. It is also true, as has also been stated by the Senator from Oregon, that at one time in the consideration of the bill in the committee, by a divided vote the original provision was stricken from the bill. Subsequently that provision was rewritten, and was rewritten in accordance with the views of the department entrusted with the administration of the measure, prepared by the draftsmen cooperating for that purpose.

We all recognize that there is some strength in the argument of the Senator from Oregon about the uncertainty which may follow a possible change in the amount of the tax. That, however, is to be done after notice and due consideration, and is not likely to happen with any degree of frequency.

Let me point out the effect of the operation of this plan if no flexibility is provided in the matter of the amount of the tax to be collected. So that there may be no misunderstanding on the point, it is well, perhaps, to bear in mind the fact that the tax may be collected for at least two separate purposes. There are at least two methods authorized and contemplated. One may be used for one commodity, and another for another, and under each money will be required. One includes the rental idea, the renting of land for the purpose of bringing about a reduction in production and the removal of excess surpluses of particular commodities which are bearing down so heavily upon the prices of those commodities. That is true particularly with reference to both wheat and cotton. There is in this country a carryover of cotton now of approximately nine and one half million bales, with a consumption last year of less than 5,000,000 bales.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Do I get the idea that the Secretary of Agriculture thinks that by decreasing this margin of the process tax he is going to diminish the crop? Has he that kind of an idea in his head?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator will have to talk with the Secretary about the ideas he has in his head.

Mr. LONG. I thought the Senator was explaining it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am not explaining his ideas. I am explaining the plans that are permissible under the bill, and the reasons why those different methods are included in the bill.

Mr. LONG. I understand, though—and I would like to be informed if I am incorrect—that, for instance, there would be a difference, we will say, of 11 cents a pound in cotton. They figure that if cotton begins to grow too fast for them, they will cut down the margin, and that will slacken the crop. If the Secretary has any idea in his head like that, he has a lot to learn.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am unable to understand how the Senator from Louisiana has ever conceived a thought of that sort from anything I have said.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Louisiana misinterpreted the idea underlying this provision. The provision is that if the tax proves so high as that people will not consume large surplus stocks piled up, and the price is, therefore, depressed, then there can be a readjustment.

I will give an illustration. Suppose, for the sake of illustration, a tax of 20 cents a pound were put on cotton, and the price were raised to, say, 30 cents. All this is merely by way of illustration. Instead of buying our cotton, let us suppose that cotton from other countries were consumed, and substitutes for cotton were resorted to, and, instead of reducing the surplus of cotton, it had the effect of piling up a larger surplus, and instead of raising the price it had the effect of depressing the price. Then the Secretary would have the right to change the rate.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I simply want to remark, if the Senator from Alabama will yield, that even with the explanation made by the Senator from Arkansas, we are all then to learn something, if that is what they think they are going to do with this bill. They are going to learn a lot.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, with reference to the necessity for flexibility in the size of the tax, it is apparently the construction of the Senator from Oregon—and probably he is right—that when the amount of the tax has been once fixed, it is then unchangeable, and he does not want it changeable. His theory is that when once fixed, the producers must forever, as long as it operates, settle at the same amount, to avoid the uncertainty in trade. Let us view the results of that. Of course, under that construction and that application, it would be necessary in the first instance to fix the tax at an amount which would bring about, in a matter of benefit to the producers of these commodities, a parity of price. Suppose we get the tax too high, as has been indicated by the Senator from Arkansas. Suppose we get the tax higher than is necessary to produce the benefits desired, or, on the other hand, suppose we fix it so high that we depress and reduce the volume of consumption, so that there would not then be as much of the commodity processed, and not as much of the commodity sold. That situation would bear down upon the consumers in a way that is not contemplated.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I gathered from the remark a moment ago that it seemed to be thought that the price once fixed would have to continue.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is what the Senator from Oregon insists.

Mr. ADAMS. Does not subsection (a) provide that such rates shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture as of the date the tax first takes effect, and the rate so determined shall at such intervals the Secretary finds necessary to effectuate the declared policy be adjusted by him to conform to such requirements?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Exactly, but that was in the rewritten section, and not in the section as it originally stood, and it was stricken out on motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. ADAMS. It is in the committee amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is in the committee amendment, yes; and that is the thing to which he objects, and that is the principal subject of controversy here now, as to whether or not there should be any authorization here for a change in the rate after it has once been fixed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the fair-exchange value is to be accepted as the basis, it is necessary to have some provision which will permit a change in the rate under reasonable conditions. Otherwise there could be no assurance that the fair-exchange value would be maintained.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is true, Mr. President, and for another reason. As I indicated in the beginning, there are two ways by which this tax may be used. One is under the so-called allotment plan, for the payment of benefits to producers upon their domestic consumption; that is, the proportion estimated for domestic consumption. If we fix the tax at an amount that is now necessary—for instance, 50 cents, we will say, assuming the present price of wheat to the farmer to be 40—then if before the benefits are paid, before the time for settlement arrives, the price of wheat has gone up, that reduces the amount of the benefit certificates, because the whole purpose of the plan is to create a price to the farmer which will give his commodities a purchasing power equivalent to the purchasing power of industrial commodities. So that if there is a change in the market price of the commodity there will be a fluctuation, of necessity, in the amount paid per unit of the commodity covered by the allotment plan. If, then, there is a tax that is unchangeable—say, at 50 cents—and we do not need it to pay the benefits in order to keep the parity, then we are collecting unnecessarily a tax which is a burden upon the consumer and serves no useful purpose. Therefore, I submit that it is absolutely essential in the administration of this plan to permit from time to time, as the result of either an error or a mistake or a miscalculation in the original ascertainment of the amount of the tax, a correction of such error or a change to meet a readjustment of the market price of the commodity covered by the allotment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I respectfully ask the Senator who has the floor, or the chairman of the committee, whether or not the provision now being discussed runs in conformity with the established rule of law which we have recognized from time immemorial, the law of supply and demand?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, while the inquiry of the distinguished Senator is not applicable at this point in the discussion, I have no hesitation in saying that the chief purpose of this bill is to give a proper application to the law of supply and demand. Unfortunately, too many people are under the impression that nature, as it has been expressed, should be permitted to take its course, that all that the farmers can produce by 16 hours' labor a day should be produced, and then let whatever effective demand there is take care of that character of a supply. The true law of supply and demand, to be effective for those who make the supply, is that the supply should be limited to the amount for which there is an effective paying demand for the supply furnished.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let me answer the Senator's inquiry. The theory of this bill is that under it there will be brought about an efficient operation of the law of supply and demand. The two plans contemplated by it—the allotment plan and the renting plan—both have for their purpose a reduction in the supply, a reduction in the surpluses which are hanging over the market and which are disturbing, destroying, and absolutely neutralizing the proper application of the law of supply and demand.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCARRAN. Will the Senator kindly explain what he means by the term "a paying demand"? I address my question again to both the Senator from Alabama and to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have the floor. The Senator may address the chairman of the committee when he sees fit, but any question he wants to propound to me I am ready to try to answer.

Mr. McCARRAN. I should like to ask if the chairman of the committee concurs in the last answer given by the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think that is entirely inappropriate. I have the floor, and there is no occasion for involving in this controversy some other Senator who is not now presenting his views.

As I stated, the granting of permission or authority to make a change, when conditions demand, in the amount of the tax is the only practicable way, Mr. President, under which this bill may be operated. It is absurd to take the position, if a mistake in the calculation of the amount of the money necessary to pay the benefits on the proportion allotted for domestic consumption is too high or too low, that either, in the one instance, the consumer must be made to suffer, or, in the other, that the taxpayer must bear the burden. The flexibility is provided in one instance for the protection of the consumer when the burden is too oppressive and it so develops. It is provided in the other for the benefit of the Treasury, if the Secretary of Agriculture has made a mistake in his calculation. If the amount of the tax is not sufficient to pay the allotment or to pay the rental, then, as a common sense, practical, business proposition, I submit that it is not only the right thing to do but is the necessary thing to do to authorize the Secretary to correct any miscalculation that has been made, to the end that the real purpose of the bill may be carried out, rather than that it shall be directed in some way not contemplated and not intended.

As I have stated, there are two ways in which the money is to be used: One is the allotment plan, which I have mentioned. The other is for the renting of land, to take it out of production, in order to reduce the very great surplus of certain of the basic agricultural commodities.

The money to pay the rentals is to be collected by this processing tax. The rentals are to be made within the course of the next 2 or 3 weeks. At present it is not known with certainty and definiteness how many acres of cotton land or of wheat land or of other lands involved may be leased. It is not known—and cannot now be known with mathematical precision—the amount of money that will be required to pay the rentals. Is it not the sensible thing—the practical thing—to permit a readjustment in order to conform the collection with the necessary outgo under the plan? So the purpose of this whole provision, Mr. President, is to correct mistakes. It is to prevent oppression and undue burden upon consumers in case the tax, even though calculated right, proves to be too burdensome under the purchasing power that may exist during the months to come.

All the phases of this bill, Mr. President, depend really upon sympathetic administration; they all depend upon the real desire of the Secretary of Agriculture, in accordance with the advice and information that he may obtain from time to time, to put into operation this plan for the benefit primarily of suffering agriculture; but also to do it in a way sympathetic to and considerate of other interests involved, including the processors, wherever a tax is to be levied; and beyond that, Mr. President, whether there may be involved an uncertainty in trade or not, whether or not there may be a delay in the accumulation of stocks—beyond all such considerations, it is clear that this bill is to be put in operation sympathetically and with great consideration for the suffering consumers of the country.

It is not intended as a one-sided program, purely for agriculture, though the interest of the producers is paramount above all other considerations under the bill; the restoration of purchasing power to that class of people is to many of us paramount in attempting to bring about a change in our unfortunate economic situation. So that we must concede, in the first place, that the interest of agriculture has first consideration in the drafting of the bill and in its administration, whatever theoretical or practical suggestions may arise in the minds of men who earnestly favor advancing the interests of the farmer, as I know the Senator from Oregon does. I have served on the committee with him for 2 years and I am glad to say it here that he has always been faithful in his efforts to better the condition of agriculture. I have never heard him strike a partisan note during all the discussion in the Committee on Agriculture—and we have been in session almost as constantly as has any committee of the Senate—nor have I ever heard the Senator from Oregon express at any time any thought or idea that he did not believe was in the interest of the farmer. However, he has some ideas with which I do not agree, although we are driving at the same object. His protest against this section of the bill is because of the effect he fears it may have upon retailers stocking up or wholesalers stocking up; but I submit that the mere possibility at some future time of a change in the tax rate, designed to bring about corrections, which are more important than a mere delay in buying, and the anxiety because of the possibility of such an uncertainty arising ought not to deter us from placing in the power of the administration the authority to adjust the rate from month to month or more often as it may develop by reason of any circumstances which may arise after the tax has once been fixed.

Let me suggest that if we are not going to permit any degree of flexibility, if we are not under any circumstances going to permit the Secretary of Agriculture to change the amount of tax, then the only alternative course is for the Senate itself to write into the bill the tax and to make it unchangeable. We all recognize that to be impracticable. We all recognize that the rate of that tax depends upon the application of one plan or the other. Take cotton, for instance, as an illustration of the point I am making. If we employ the allotment plan, with less than 5,000,000 bales of cotton domestically consumed, a tax of about 7 cents a pound will be needed. If we use the rental plan, leasing land so as to reduce production 40 percent or more, then probably we shall not need a tax of more than 3½ cents per pound. So the size of the tax depends upon what plan shall be used. It may, of course, as I have insisted under changed conditions, new developments, be necessary from time to time to make changes in the tax, whether it be applied to the rental plan or the allotment plan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator indicates a possible tax of 7 cents a pound under the allotment plan and 3½ cents a pound under the leasing plan.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The amount of the tax is merely suggestive.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator indicate what it might be under the cost-of-production plan?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be very glad to discuss the cost-of-production plan when we get to it, but I will say now, so that there may be no misunderstanding in the Senator's mind and in the mind of any other Senator hearing me, that I am opposed to that section of the bill embodying the cost-of-production plan. When we reach that section I will discuss that question; but I would rather not obscure the question now before us nor be diverted from its discussion, because I do not think a debate on the cost-of-production plan would throw any light upon the flexibility provided in the section now under consideration, because there is no tax involved in the cost-of-production plan.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say about the pending question. I think we would very largely destroy the effectiveness of the operation of the bill, its sympathetic and friendly operation toward all the interests involved if we should require the Secretary of Agriculture, in the first instance, to fix a tax which could not be changed. My own judgment is that he ought not to fix the highest tax that he is authorized to fix at the very first step of the program. If the tax shall overnight be put too high, if overnight a tax of 50 cents a bushel should be imposed on wheat or 7 cents a pound on cotton under an allotment plan, would we too greatly wrench the whole trade in that line of commodities? I think it will be more effective and make the bill more acceptable if the Secretary of Agriculture shall be authorized to step up the tax from time to time, starting in a gradual way and finally reaching the necessary goal to give the farmer the purchasing power contemplated under the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, those Members of the Senate who have not heard the testimony or who perhaps have not read it thoroughly and caught the spirit of the bill will see that this particular paragraph, subsection (b), provides that—

> The processing tax shall be at such rate as equals the difference between the current average farm price for the commodity and the fair exchange value of the commodity.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me right there?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course, when this tax is first fixed, it must be determined what the current price is.

Mr. SMITH. I am coming to that feature now.

Mr. CONNALLY. But after the tax has once been put on, and is in operation, then how is it known what the current price is?

Mr. SMITH. I just started to say that the text of this bill provides that it shall act automatically. The current price is taken today, and a tax is fixed which in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture, according to the facts before him, approximates or equals the parity prevailing during the basic period. Tomorrow the price goes down and automatically the tax increases just by the percentage that it goes down.

Mr. CONNALLY. Suppose cotton is selling on the market tomorrow at 6 cents. We put this bill into effect and have a 2-cent tax. There would still be a market for the cotton; and the Senator's idea is that if the 2 cents tax did not raise the price to 8 cents, but only to 7 cents, we would still put on another cent tax?

Mr. SMITH. No. Suppose the bill goes into effect and that the step-up we want now is 2 cents. Cotton goes down tomorrow a quarter of a cent. The tax then would be 2¼ cents, because we want to keep that parity. The tax goes up automatically. But if cotton goes up 1 cent a pound, the tax is automatically that much less, because the bill provides that when the price of the commodity shall equal the parity period the tax is gone.

Mr. CONNALLY. In other words, it is really an attempt to peg the price at a certain figure, and if the first tax does not do it, then another one is added.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the genius of the bill is this.

Mr. CONNALLY. But I do not understand "genius." [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Let him go ahead. I want to know about the genius.

Mr. SMITH. I thought perhaps in a body of geniuses the term would be perfectly well understood.

Mr. CONNALLY. But we want it explained so that we farmers will understand it.

Mr. SMITH. Then the Senator is not in the class of geniuses?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I am not a genius!

Mr. SMITH. Very well. Under the terms of the bill we fix a certain period for the parity price. The average price for that period is the relative price the farmer is going to get; that is, his price will be 100 cents worth of the things he is going to buy. The Senator said it is pegging the price. It is practically doing that.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is an attempt to do it.

Mr. SMITH. We are bringing it to where the 100-cent farmer dollar will buy 100 cents' worth of what the farmer wants to buy. If we take not the full relativity, to use Mr. Einstein's term, but if we take the proportion that cotton will have to come up—say, 2 cents a pound—and if we take as the proper price the consuming public should pay that price which would bring a fair return to the farmer under the circumstances, then the situation would be this: We fix the tax of 2 cents a pound. Cotton goes down a cent, and the tax then becomes automatically 3 cents, because we have fixed the 2 cents on the basis of the price of cotton the day we fixed it. If cotton goes up a cent, then the tax is only 1 cent.

Mr. CONNALLY. Can the tax be changed every day?

Mr. SMITH. The tax automatically changes itself as each day requires a fluctuation from the fixed standard.

Mr. CONNALLY. I want to get that straight. Suppose cotton is 7 cents today and a number of merchants buy cotton at that figure and then we put a tax on tomorrow to bring it up to 8 cents.

Mr. SMITH. But we would not put on a tax. The tax is based upon, let us say, a price of 6 cents today. We fix the parity at 8 cents, requiring a tax of 2 cents a pound. Cotton goes up only a cent a pound and we have to collect only 1 cent a pound tax. If tomorrow cotton goes down to 5 cents we have to collect 3 cents tax. It works automatically so the trade knows every day what tax it has to pay by virtue of the conditions. But if the Secretary of Agriculture finds that the price of 8 cents is too much, then under the terms of the bill he can put the tax at 1 cent.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the tax does not change except when altered by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no!

Mr. SMITH. For this reason: Suppose cotton were 6 cents a pound today and the parity price would be 12 cents. If cotton goes up a cent a pound tomorrow, the tax necessarily would be only 5 cents. If it should rise the next day another cent the tax would be only 4 cents. If the parity is on the basis of 6 cents, with the relation to 8 cents as the first step-up, and when I sell my cotton I get 7 cents for it, the man who fixes my certificate would give me a certificate to get 1 cent more, because my certificate would show what I got for the cotton. If I got 8 cents for my cotton, I would not get any tax at all. That is exactly what the bill means, as the Senator would realize if he would read it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have read it carefully and I say that the tax, once imposed by the Secretary, remains the same, whatever rate he imposes, until he changes it.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will read the paragraph I have just read, he will see what it means. It provides that the processing tax shall be at such a rate as equals the difference between the current average farm prices for the commodity and the fair exchange value for the commodity. Now, "current" means each day. If we fix that value at 8 cents that we are going to get for a given period——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I see where the Senator's statement is going to lead, but if he will read the bill himself [laughter]——

Mr. SMITH. I have read it ad nauseum. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. He will see that the Secretary of Agriculture fixes the rate as of the date the tax first takes effect.

Mr. SMITH. Exactly. That is exactly what I said. Suppose he fixes it at 2 cents above today's price, and as the result of that fixing the price drops 1 cent. He will then say, "I have gone a little too high." Under the genius of the bill—no, Mr. President, I will not use that term any more! [Laughter.] Under the terms of the bill he can lower that tax if he finds that by the imposition of the 2 cents it has caused less consumption. But if, upon investigation, he finds that the drop in price is from some other cause than consumption—manipulation of the market, for instance—then the tax would be 3 cents, because the bill says the parity shall be maintained.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In order that there may be no misunderstanding by the Senator from South Carolina, I think that some members of the committee and I have an entirely different construction from that which he has placed on it. I think the tax, once levied at whatever rate fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture, is perpetuated until that rate is changed by him.

Mr. SMITH. Let me give this illustration to the Senator from Arkansas. Suppose we fix a tax of 4 cents a pound. The difference between the present price of farm products, to bring them to a parity, means 4 cents a pound on cotton today. Tomorrow cotton advances 2 cents a pound. Are we still going to levy a 4-cent tax?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator let me explain that?

Mr. SMITH. No; I want to get my explanation straight, because one of the reasons why I think this might be an admirable thing is that as the price rises the tax becomes less, because the bill provides that when the price shall equal the parity price fixed in the bill the tax shall cease and determine.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I think I can reconcile the differences between the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Arkansas. I think they are both partly right.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator means me mostly? [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. Possibly so. Evidently, as I read the bill, when the Secretary fixes the tax it stays fixed until he unfixes it by changing it. On the other hand, the Senator from South Carolina, reading the processing-tax feature, has read what is merely a definition, but is also a limitation on the power of the Secretary, indicating that that is the rate of tax that he shall fix.

If he fixes it and it does not have the effect desired he will have to fix it again, as I see it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is the reason for giving him the power to change it.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is the reason for the language following, which provides that, unless that result is attained, then the Secretary shall cause appropriate investigation and due notice, and so on. I do not see how the tax could be fixed automatically because all we would have to do, according to the theory of the Senator from South Carolina, is to fix it once and go off and leave it and it would take care of itself. But that cannot be. That is what is the matter with the farmer now. We have fixed him and gone off and left him. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. The theory is that if by the imposition of the tax there is a decrease in price and, upon investigation the Secretary so finds, then he may change it.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is why it cannot be automatic. We have to wait for the Secretary to determine just how much of a change to order. That is why I was interrogating the Senator in the way I did. If the price fluctuates and today it is 7 cents and tomorrow 8 cents, would there not be a daily change in the rate?

Mr. SMITH. I have tried to visualize it as a cotton producer.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. The Secretary fixes the price in the first place, does he not?

Mr. SMITH. He fixes the tax.

Mr. LOGAN. Let us stick to it as the price. The tax follows automatically because it is the difference between the market price and the price fixed. As the price of any commodity rises toward the base price, the less the tax is until it reaches the base price, and then there is no tax.

Mr. SMITH. Exactly.

Mr. LOGAN. But if it goes down, the tax increases. Every time the price goes down from the base price then the tax must necessarily increase.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; and if the Secretary finds that the decreased price is on account of the imposition of the tax he can modify it.

Mr. LOGAN. That is correct.

Mr. SMITH. That is as far as I have gone.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is right. I am agreeing with him absolutely.

Mr. SMITH. Good enough.

Mr. President, the bill would be absurd if that were not a fact, for this reason: Suppose the price were fixed upon the basis of today. We want to raise it to 8 cents. That is our objective. That is our base price. I sell cotton stipulated under the bill, and the man who buys it makes a statement that he gave me 7 cents for it. I carry the statement to the commissioner, and the commissioner issues a certificate that I am entitled to 1 cent, because the addition of the 1 cent would make the 8 cents which we desire to reach. If, on the other hand, the price were to go down a cent, and I presented that to the commissioner, he would say, "You are entitled to 3 cents," because the objective is 8 cents. Otherwise cotton might rise from 6 cents or 5 cents up to 7 cents, and the same identical tax would be collected as though there were no change at all.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, may I ask the Senator another question? If, over a series of months or years, it is found that the base price is wrong, and that the yardstick has changed, then the Secretary of Agriculture may establish a new base price?

Mr. SMITH. Why, as a matter of course; and I did my best to call attention to the fact that once the parity price is fixed—and it must be fixed——

Mr. LOGAN. The tax is automatic?

Mr. SMITH. The tax then is automatic until it is found that consumption has been arbitrarily interfered with, and I challenge anyone here to disprove that statement.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope the Senator can make the Senators understand that.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that I do not understand that there is anything automatic about this tax.

What takes place is this: Suppose we take wheat. If wheat is selling today at 50 cents and the Secretary of Agriculture finds that the base price to give a wheat farmer the purchasing power that he had from 1909 to 1914 is 94 cents, he would then add 44 cents tax. That is the tax he would add; and when that tax went to the processor, my understanding is, from the testimony given before the committee, that the tax would be 44 cents. If at any time the Secretary found that tax was wrong, he would change it.

Mr. SMITH. Let me ask the Senator a question. Suppose immediately upon the imposition of the 44 cents tax a miller says, "I will give this purchaser 60 cents for his wheat." Under the terms of this bill the man who buys that wheat has to give the seller a certificate of how much wheat he bought, what percent of the total amount he bought. That is all he has to do. Then the producer goes to his county commissioner and he figures out what percentage is for export and what percentage is for domestic consumption. He has to give me—the wheat producer—a certificate showing how much money I am entitled to under the parity. The statement from the buyer says, "This wheat sold at 60 cents." The commissioner figures the difference between 60 and 90 cents and gives the farmer a certificate, and that is all the tax that will have to be paid.

If it does not work that way, how would you work it? Because there is a paragraph in the bill which provides that the Secretary may not issue any licenses at all, but may agree with the processors that they will offer the base price to begin with, and neither require a license nor require anything but that agreement.

If they agree to give the base price, there is no tax at all, because all the farmer has to do is to go out and sell his stuff. The miller has already paid, or agreed to pay, the base price without any licenses or any further complications; and therefore the county agent will write out the certificate for the full amount of the parity.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, under either operation the farmer gets what would be the base price, except that he gets it in a round-about way in one case and directly in the other. For instance, if the base price of wheat is 90 cents and he gets 90 cents, that is the end of it?

Mr. SMITH. That is the end of it.

Mr. BARKLEY. But if the base price is 90 cents and the purchaser pays him only 60 cents, then the purchaser must pay 30 cents to the commissioner, and in turn the farmer gets that 30 cents?

Mr. SMITH. Why, certainly; or the same thing in principle if he pays 70 cents.

Mr. BARKLEY. Or 80.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. So that wherever he sells his product for less than the base price the farmer ultimately gets the base price, but part of it he gets in a round-about way and the other part directly.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Now let us take the other side. Suppose when you go out to sell, wheat has gone down below the base price as of the day that the commodity price goes into effect. You have to take some day as the basis. Suppose when it goes into effect wheat is 40 cents a bushel. When you go to sell your wheat they say, "We will charge 50 cents tax." When you go to sell your wheat you get 50 cents. Forty cents is due. The man who makes out the slip makes it out for the entire amount at the market price. That goes to the commissioner at the county seat. He figures what percent is exported and what percent is used domestically.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, right there, by what formula is any county commissioner in any ordinary county seat going to figure out what proportion of anybody's wheat is going into domestic consumption and what proportion is going into foreign consumption?

Mr. SMITH. Under the terms of the bill that is to be ascertained by the Secretary of Agriculture and furnished to him.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, then, it is an average percentage for the whole country?

Mr. SMITH. Why, certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is not figured on the basis of any one man's crop?

Mr. SMITH. Oh, no. It is an average percentage, so that everybody will get the same percentage.

Mr. BARKLEY. That information is furnished to the commissioner by the Department, so that he knows, out of every man's crop, regardless of the number of bushels, what proportion of it will go into foreign trade and what proportion will stay at home?

Mr. SMITH. Just exactly as it is figured.

Mr. BARKLEY. This thing is almost simple.

Mr. SMITH. Why, it is. If anyone will study the bill carefully, any of the geniuses here—they will find that this thing will work necessarily. The machinery that is set up takes care of it.

Let us take cotton. Cotton today is 6 cents a pound. Suppose the ultimate price is fixed at 12 cents a pound. The difference between what it is bringing today and the parity is 6 cents a pound. I go to sell mine, and they give me 8 cents a pound. I take the statement of that price to my county commissioner, and he figures up that I have already received 2 cents of the 6, and I am entitled to only 4 cents a pound more. It is perfectly plain—perfectly automatic.

Mr. LOGAN. But, Mr. President, suppose 60 percent of the cotton is exported and only 40 percent of it is for home consumption. There is the other 4 cents. The farmer would get only 40 percent of that 4 cents, would he not?

Mr. SMITH. No; they would figure out what percentage is to be exported and what percentage is to be domestically consumed, and he would get the 40 percent only on what is domestically consumed.

Mr. LOGAN. That is what I thought.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, there is no tax levied on the proportion of it that is supposed to go abroad.

Mr. SMITH. Not a dollar.

Mr. BARKLEY. And when the farmer gets his price, if it is cotton, he gets his 5 cents on that, and he is through?

Mr. SMITH. He is through.

Mr. BARKLEY. But only on the other 40 percent, we will say, is the tax collected, and then it is turned over to him?

Mr. SMITH. Yes. There is about 45 percent consumed in this country.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The purpose of the revenue to be obtained from the tax is stated in section 9 (a):

> To obtain revenue for extraordinary expenses incurred by reason of the existing national economic emergency, including expenditures for rental and benefit payments and administrative expenses under this title.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. How are we going to obtain revenues for those purposes if the tax automatically goes off with a change in the price level?

Mr. SMITH. Because there are two different principles in the bill. They are distinct principles. One is the leasing principle, which I attempted to explain the other day, which has no reference whatever to the allotment principle. The Secretary said to us before the committee that in the territory where he proposed to apply the leasing principle he would not apply the allotment principle, for the obvious reason that if he is going to rent the land, then he will fix an unchangeable, arbitrary tax on the processing commodity, because he has figured out how much land he wants to lease and what rent he is going to pay. Therefore he fixes a definite, unchangeable tax to get money enough to lease the 50,000,000 acres of land. That has no reference to the allotment. The language the Senator has read was inclusive of both principles, but both of them cannot be worked with the same farmer or perhaps in the same territory.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Secretary levy a special tax to pay administrative expenses?

Mr. SMITH. No; he levies enough to take care of the administrative expenses. Of course he is going to give himself a margin in either case.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But where does he get that if the tax automatically disappears or fluctuates with the changes in the price level?

Mr. SMITH. Because he will have that much less expense. The farmer gets the money, and that is the object. The Secretary also intimated that he may have to come to the Treasury and get an appropriation to cover just exactly the point that I have made here to the Senate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator seems to be having some trouble with the price-fixing factors of the bill. I wonder if he will permit me to read him just a few sentences which may throw a great deal of light on the subject.

I have in my hand a pamphlet issued by the Department of Agriculture under the authorship of Mr. Mordecai Ezekiel, who, I understand, will be one of the high administrators of this new system.

Mr. SMITH. What is the name?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. Mordecai Ezekiel.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In dealing with the price factors affecting hogs, Mr. Ezekiel makes the whole thing very plain; and I want to read the Senator these sentences.

Mr. SMITH. In reference to what?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The price of hogs, which are affected also by this bill.

Mr. SMITH. I know; but that is more complicated than this.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I hope the Senator will let me read this to him to show what a grasp Mr. Ezekiel has upon this subject.

Mr. SMITH. To be sure.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I read:

> The price for each month may be conceived as represented by a small black ball, suspended above the line for its own date, at the height of the average price for that month, and as far over from right to left as indicated by the supply for that month. There would necessarily be only one ball for each month. These balls, however, would all be very close to the demand surface, a little above it for those months when the actual price was higher than the price as shown by the correlation formula and a little lower for the months when the actual price was a little below the estimated price. In general, however, it would be seen that the demand surface approximated the position that these prices occupy, as they were thus suspended through space and time.

I want to know if that does not clear it up. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. I should like to have the Senator explain that explanation.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, may I inquire the name of the gentleman who wrote that pamphlet?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a point of order.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to know the name of the authority.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The authority is Mr. Mordecai Ezekiel, who is to be one of the high administrators of the new farm relief bill.

Mr. LOGAN. He would not be supposed to know anything about hogs, would he, with that name? [Laughter.]

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, regardless of the nomenclature, I hope the Senator from Kentucky will pursue this subject in this very interesting pamphlet, because I have only scratched the surface of this illuminating discussion of hogs by Mr. Mordecai Ezekiel.

Mr. SMITH. Now, Mr. President, I want to say just a few words, and then I am through.

I do not want any Member of this body to think that I—the Senate will excuse this personal allusion, but I am entitled to make it—that I, perhaps the nearest approach to a real dirt farmer of any Member of the Senate, have any object in view except to aid that distressed element of our population who, from time immemorial, have been notoriously poor, and the butt of every joke that appears in our literature.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. Just one minute. I want to get through with what I have to say.

I do not want the impression to go out that I am opposing legislation in reference to the occupation in which I and my forebears have been engaged. After 24 long years of service in this body, I do not want to be met with the insinuation that I am trying to block legislation looking toward the relief of those for whom I have spent all my official life. I have more reason to be the author and champion of legislation looking toward the relief of the farmer than any other man in this body, and no man dares charge me with being unfaithful to that trust.

Mr. President, I want to put a stop now and forever to the idea that I for any reason but for the aid of agriculture have taken the position I have taken. I believe I have more knowledge of what is necessary to aid the man between the plow handles and the man with the hoe than the man who makes his living otherwise and flirts with agriculture as a side line. I am tired of being dictated to in this body by window-sill agriculturists. I want the man who talks to me about agriculture to be the man who has fought the boll-weevil, who has gone out and has seen one tropical storm wipe out his hope of existence, not of profit, because he has never made a profit.

Am I to be asked to come into this body and subordinate my convictions to the theories of those who do not know a cotton stalk from a jimsonweed? Must I come here and subordinate my convictions to a lot of men who have never borne the heat and burden of the day?

Thank God, I have the confidence and respect of my colleagues in this body for my sincerity of purpose and honesty of conviction, and I will not become an intellectual prostitute for any man. My convictions are not for sale to anybody. Must I stand here today and have about me the atmosphere that I will not faithfully do my duty to try to benefit those to whom I belong?

Mr. President, I hope that it will not be necessary for me to refer to this again, but if it does become necessary I will refer to it more positively than I have done this evening.

So far as the pending bill is concerned, I am going to let it take its course, hoping and praying that it may bring about the result which those who drafted it and are putting it through hoped it might; but I do not believe it will, I am not going to subordinate my convictions to those of anybody else. I am not throwing monkey wrenches into the machinery, but I am not going to attempt to extol that which I do not think worthy of being extolled, or to advocate that which I do not believe will do the work which the poor farmers need to have done. No; I will not.

Mr. President, I am a Democrat. I defy any man in this body to put his finger on one vote or one statement of mine which does not ring true to democracy. Every vote I have cast, every speech I have made, has been as pure democracy as that of Jefferson himself, and who is to rise up in this hour of the incoming of a Democratic administration and charge me with a lack of fealty to Democratic principles? I will stand here and vote to uphold them now as I have heretofore. No man shall ever question it.

Mr. President, I see that there is intimation, even on the other side, of Senators yielding to some of the great doctrines of the party to which I belong. I welcome them coming, and pray God that on this side Senators will stand fast to those doctrines. We were swept into power because the people of the United States believed that the Democratic Party was the only organization which could save the country in this, her hour of imminent peril. God grant that every one of us will be true to the confidence expressed in us on November 8, 1932. So far as I am concerned, I shall stay true to those principles despite all question. I will keep my political self-respect, my personal and mental integrity, at all costs, and I believe that my colleagues will grant me that.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I wish to present an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the pending bill, and ask that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, it is hardly fair to the Department which has issued the bulletin to which attention has been called to have excerpts read, as the Senator from Michigan has done, without the accompanying descriptive matter. I am sending to the desk the table, and I ask that the portion on page 34, which has been marked, may be read by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Factors X_1, X_2, and X_3 were included as different measures of the influence of supply; factors X_4, X_5, X_6, X_7, and X_8 as forces influencing demand; X_9 to allow for any trend in price apart from that accounted for by the factors stated; and X_{10} to adjust for the effect of changes in the value of money upon hog prices.

Since practically all of the factors were thought to have a relative rather than an additive relation to price, all of the factors except X_9, time, were stated as logarithms.

Correlating the factors thus stated, a multiple correlation of hog prices with the 10 other factors of $R=0.936$ was obtained. Correcting this to take account of the fact that 10 constants were determined with only 90 observations, the true multiple correlation is reduced to 0.928.

The regression equation is as follows:

(1) $\log X_{11} = -0.09443 \log X_1 + 0.15888 \log X_2 - 0.21986 \log X_3 - 0.23675 \log X_4 - 0.07250 \log X_5 + 2.23777 \log X_6 + 0.04759 \log X_7 + 0.22659 \log X_8 - 0.03036 X_9 + 1.63099 \log X_{10} - K$.

[Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, are they still talking about hogs? [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, this is a table relating to hogs. It clears the matter up.

The legislative clerk continued the reading, as follows:

The value of the constant (k) in this equation varies according to the units in which the different variables are expressed. The variable X_{10} represents the price index, so moving the regression value for that variable to the left of the equality sign gives the regression equation for the prices deflated according to the observed relation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is perfectly manifest that higher mathematics has not much recognition in this body.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I wish to offer to the pending amendment, if it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the proposed amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from North Dakota offers the following amendment to the amendment: On page 12, in line 2, after the word "commodity" and the period, to insert the following:

In computing the current average farm price in the case of wheat, premiums paid producers for protein content shall not be taken into account.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, it will be noted on page 11, paragraph (b), that it is provided that the processing tax shall be at such rate as equals the difference between the current average farm price for the commodity and the fair exchange value of the commodity. In the case of wheat the current farm price would be the average price paid to the farmers for their wheat. Some years we have in wheat a high protein content, which gives us a premium price for the wheat. It applies to the hard spring wheat some years in the hard spring-wheat territory; in other years it applies to certain grades of winter wheat in the so-called "winter-wheat territory."

I am anxious to have this amendment adopted, so that that protein premium which may be paid for wheat will not be figured in the current average price of wheat, so that the farmer who gets a protein premium will receive that on top of the average current price.

Mr. President, I will say that this amendment was the provision that was in the old allotment bill that was passed by the House, H.R. 13991, and considered by the Senate during the last session, but which failed of passage in the Senate. The amendment I have offered appears in that bill, for the protection of the wheat growers who might have a wheat that brought a premium for protein content.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow the amendment to go over for consideration in the morning, I should like to move an adjournment until 12 o'clock tomorrow.

INTERPRETATION OF PRESIDENT'S REGULATIONS RESPECTING VETERANS (S.DOC. NO. 19)

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document a communication which I have received from the Solicitor of the Veterans' Administration.

As is well known to the Senate, the President issued certain regulations on March 31, 1933, under the "act to maintain the credit of the United States Government." These regulations are more or less legalistic in form, and it occurred to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] and myself to write the solicitor asking him to give us a detailed explanation of each regulation, and we did so. The correspondence I hold in my hand furnishes the information called for. It is very helpful, and every veteran in the country ought to have the benefit of the information. It not only restates the regulations issued by the President, but it interprets those regulations and explains just how they will be administered.

I ask unanimous consent that the communication from the Solicitor of the Veterans' Administration be printed as a public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COOLIDGE in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. It will be printed also in the RECORD, I presume?

Mr. WALSH. The difficulty is that there are two styles of type, one for matter printed in the RECORD and one for public documents. Better type will be used if it is printed as a public document, and it will be less expensive than having it printed twice in two different styles of type.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT, as in executive session, laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. SMITH. I move that the Senate adjourn until tomorrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, April 11, 1933, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, APRIL 10, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. M. R. Fleming, D.D., pastor of the United Brethren Church, Red Lion, Pa., offered the following prayer:

Lord of the world above, Thou art Lord of the world in which we live. God of our fathers, Thou art our God. We come to Thee with songs in our hearts for Thy gracious gifts, which are beyond counting. We thank Thee for the silent and beautiful kingdom of the past. How wonderful has been Thy providence in the life of our Nation. Our hearts are deeply grateful for the riches of grace as found in the blessings of the present.

Give us wisdom to know Thy will and power faithfully to fulfill the same. In all our days grant us divine help, in all of our dangers divine protection, in all our uncertainties divine counsel, in all our sorrows divine peace.

May the benediction of Thy presence be our rich heritage this day and all our days. May the comforting power of the spirit of God lead us in all life's activities; and may the peace of God that passeth all understanding keep our hearts and minds through the riches of grace. In Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, April 6, was read and approved.

IMPEACHMENT PROCEEDINGS AGAINST FEDERAL JUDGE HAROLD LOUDERBACK

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the managers on the part of the House in the Louderback impeachment matter be excused from attending upon the sessions of the House during this week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF HOUSE RULE XIV

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged report from the Committee on Rules and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 100

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution rule XIV be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding at the end thereof the following new clause, viz:

"8. It shall not be in order for any Member to introduce to or to bring to the attention of the House during its sessions any occupant in the galleries of the House; nor may the Speaker entertain a request for the suspension of this rule by unanimous consent or otherwise."

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman inform the House just what this resolution means?

Mr. POU. It stops the introduction of people in the gallery.

Mr. SNELL. I think this is a good resolution and should go through.

The resolution was agreed to.

EMBARGO ON SHIPMENT OF ARMS

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 101

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 93, a joint resolution to prohibit the exportation of arms or munitions of war from the United States under certain conditions, and all points of order against said bill shall be considered as waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed 4 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from North Carolina has several reports from the Committee on Rules. If it is entirely agreeable to the gentleman from North Carolina and to the House, I think it would be well if unanimous consent were granted to take up at least a portion of these reports, consider them, and dispose of as many as possible of them today.

I make this suggestion for the reason that tomorrow we are going to have the farm finance mortgage plan before the House. It is hoped we can dispose of it within 2 days at the outside. Then I think within a few days we are going to have the securities bill.

I have been running over in my mind just how much additional legislation we would have to pass in the House in order to complete the emergency legislation proposed by the President. According to my best understanding, there will be at least nine more bills to be passed by the House. Of course, our calendar is clear now, and the House cannot act on any of the bills until the committees report them.

Mr. SNELL. While the gentleman is on his feet, I wish he would tell the House what the program of the majority is for the immediate future. I think we ought to know.

Mr. BYRNS. The only program I can outline to the gentleman from New York is that as rapidly as these bills are reported from committees we will take them up in the House and dispose of them. Naturally, I cannot give the gentleman any information as to when this will be, because I am not informed, but just as rapidly as the bills are reported they will be taken up in the House.

Mr. SNELL. It seems to me within a few days we ought to know what is going to be the definite program of the majority.

Mr. BYRNS. I quite agree with the gentleman. I have just explained why it was impossible for me to indicate to the gentleman any more than I have what the program will be. I just stated a moment ago, although possibly the gentleman did not hear me, that the farm bill will be in here tomorrow. It is the expectation to take it up tomorrow; and this was the reason I expressed the hope, if it were agreeable to the gentleman from North Carolina, that he dispose of at least some of his rules today, if it is possible, by unanimous consent so as to clear the calendar for tomorrow.

Mr. SNELL. While the gentleman is on his feet, will he tell us what the nine bills are that he has mentioned?

Mr. BYRNS. It is merely a matter of conjecture, although I shall be pleased to relate some of them to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. I wish the gentleman would give us all the information he can.

Mr. BYRNS. We have the farm bill, which will come up for action tomorrow. The securities bill is pending before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The Wagner bill is pending before the Committee on Banking. Then there will be a banking bill of some kind. There will be possibly some legislation with reference to the railroads. Then there is Muscle Shoals legislation. The message in regard to Muscle Shoals will come to the House today and the bill will probably be introduced tomorrow. There is the gasoline tax bill, which is pending before the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And there is the 6-hour-day labor bill.

Mr. BYRNS. I was speaking more particularly now of the President's emergency legislation. I understand a bill will come before the House which will seek to give the President some authority in arranging tariffs with relation to the tariffs of other countries—a bill which must be considered and, undoubtedly, should be passed.

Another bill is a public works bill, which, I understand, is contemplated. So there are at least nine bills. In addition to these there is pressing upon the House the Black-Connery bill. I do not know whether this is a part of the administration's program or not, but it is here and on the calendar, I understand.

Mr. SNELL. As long as we are on this subject, with all this very comprehensive legislation before us, it is evident that the Congress will be in session for some time, unless the gentlemen of the majority expect to put this legislation through without any consideration on the part of the House.

Mr. BYRNS. I quite agree with the gentleman; and I am sure no one wants to put through the legislation without giving the House an opportunity to fully consider it; but unless the committees report, of course, the gentleman understands the House cannot take action, and while I am not criticizing any committee, because I think the committees should give full attention and consideration to these bills, I am expressing the hope to some of the chairmen whom I see before me now that they speed these matters just as rapidly as they can in order to give the House something to work on, so we will not have to adjourn over as we had to do last Thursday.

Mr. SNELL. I may say to the majority leader that, while we have done our part in trying to advance the emergency legislation, when it comes to comprehensive legislation that would affect the policy of this country for a period of years, we shall insist, as far as we are able, on careful and considerate attention on the part of the House.

Mr. BYRNS. I think the entire House is entitled to that.

Mr. SNELL. I am glad to hear the majority leader make that statement.

Mr. BYRNS. But if we are to get away within any reasonable time, we will have to begin consideration of some of these measures, which is the point I am making now.

My own judgment is, we ought not to consider anything in this House until we have disposed of the President's emergency legislation one way or the other. This is all we have done up to this time. However, under the rules, these bills have to go to a committee and, of course, the House cannot act until the committee reports.

Mr. SNELL. A great majority of the bills before us or in the offing are bills affecting policy that should be considered very carefully.

Mr. BYRNS. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. May I ask the gentleman from North Carolina whether or not any of these rules pertain to the discharge rule?

Mr. POU. No.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit one question?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Do I understand from the gentleman's statement that the Black bill is not now included in the program of the President?

Mr. BYRNS. I do not know, I am frank to say to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. We do not know, either.

Mr. BYRNS. I have not seen any expression from the administration with reference to it, and I am not able to speak for the administration with reference to that bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on April 5, 1933, the President approved and signed a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 3342. An act to provide revenue for the District of Columbia by the taxation of beverages, and for other purposes.

INVESTIGATION OF THE "AKRON" DISASTER

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, there are two resolutions that I believe come with a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules.

I offer now a concurrent resolution providing for an investigation of the Akron disaster, and I shall ask unanimous consent to eliminate the last paragraph of the resolution.

Mr. LEHLBACH. If the gentleman will permit, did I understand the gentleman to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution making in order the embargo bill?

Mr. POU. No; this is with respect to an investigation of the Akron disaster.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman say that he is only going to call up two rules today?

Mr. POU. No; there is one other that will be called up later. I myself am presenting two.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. One is the Akron investigation?

Mr. POU. Yes; and the other resolution, which I believe is a unanimous report, prevents the dividing of a question, as reported by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The understanding in the Rules Committee was that there would be but two of these resolutions called up today.

Mr. POU. This is by unanimous consent; and if there is any objection, I shall not press them.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The divisibility rule was certainly not a unanimous report from the committee.

Mr. POU. I was in error about that. I shall merely present it for printing under the rule.

Mr. LEHLBACH. And the gentleman does not intend to press the embargo rule at this time?

Mr. POU. Not at this time.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman whether he can tell the House when he will bring up the embargo bill under the rule.

Mr. POU. I shall present the resolution to the House today to be referred to the calendar and printed. Just when it will be brought up I cannot state at this time, but it will be in the very near future.

Mr. FISH. Can the gentleman give us some warning in advance so we can have the minority views available? If the measure were brought up today, the minority views would not be available.

Mr. POU. I will do the best I can, but just how much warning I can give I would not undertake to say at this time.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution (H.Con.Res. 15), as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there is hereby created a joint committee to consist of five Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The committee shall select its own chairman.

Such committee is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the cause or causes of the wreck of the Navy dirigible Akron and the wrecks of other Army and Navy dirigibles, to fix responsibility for the same, to inquire generally into the question of the utility of dirigibles in the Military and Naval Establishments, and to make recommendations to the Senate and House of Representatives with respect to the future use of dirigibles for military or naval purposes. The committee shall report to the Senate and House of Representatives as soon as practicable the results of its investigations, together with its recommendations.

For the purpose of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommitee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions or recesses of the present Congress, to employ such experts, clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths and affirmations, to take testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable.

Subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee and shall be served by any person designated by him. The provisions of sections 102, 103, and 104 of the Revised Statutes shall be applicable to any person summoned as a witness under the authority of this resolution in the same manner as such provisions are applicable to any person summoned as a witness in the case of an inquiry before a committee of either House.

The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $3,000, shall be paid one half out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one half out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers approved and signed by the chairman of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Pou: Strike out the last paragraph, reading as follows: "The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $3,000, shall be paid one half out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one half out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers approved and signed by the chairman of the committee."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO CLAUSE 6, RULE XVI

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules for printing under the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 102

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution clause 6 of rule XVI be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"On the demand of any Member, before the question is put, a question shall be divided if it includes propositions so distinct in substance that one being taken away a substantive proposition shall remain: Provided, That any motion or resolution to elect members or any portion of the members of the standing committees of the House, and the joint standing committees shall not be divisible, nor shall any resolution or order reported by the Committee on Rules, providing a special order of business be divisible."

The resolution was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

THE POST OFFICE COMMITTEE

Mr. SABATH. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the resolution extending the power of the Post Office Committee, giving them additional time to make a report.

Mr. RANSLEY. I understood that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] desired to take the floor in reference to that resolution, and that it would be brought up on Tuesday.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] is in favor of the resolution, and I do not desire to deprive him of the opportunity to speak on the resolution.

Mr. RANSLEY. It was the understanding of the gentleman that this was not to be called up until tomorrow so as to give him the opportunity to express his views.

Mr. SABATH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I desire to defer my request.

INVESTIGATION OF THE MOTION-PICTURE INDUSTRY

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House Resolution 95 relating to the investigation of corporations engaged in the production, distribution, and exhibition of motion and sonant pictures.

Mr. O'CONNOR. This is not suspension day, Mr. Speaker; the gentleman cannot move to suspend the rules.

Mr. MAPES. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that this is not suspension day.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SABATH. I ask unanimous consent to consider House Resolution 95.

Mr. WARREN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SABATH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I present a report from the Rules Committee for printing under the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 95

Resolved, That there is hereby created a committee which shall be composed of seven Members of the House of Representatives.

SEC. 2. The committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed—

(1) To sit and act at such times and places as may be necessary to hold hearings to conduct an investigation and study of all matters relating to the production, licensing, sale, distribution, financing, incorporation, commercial operations, banking, theater leasing or ownership, realty, sound production, and all other related and interrelated combinations, affiliations, and organizations of production, distribution, license, lease or sale, and presentation or exhibition of the product of and by organizations of all character engaged in and/or associated or affiliated or financially or commercially interested in the motion and sonant pictures industry and of all matters and acts relating to or concerned with the issuance and/or sale or hypothecation of motion and sonant pictures industry securities of all forms by such organizations directly or through agents or other means, or by banking or security-selling organizations or their associates or affiliates;

When its report is filed as provided the committee shall cease to exist.

The resolution was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

TENNESSEE VALLEY DEVELOPMENT (H.DOC. NO. 15)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

To the Congress:

The continued idleness of a great national investment in the Tennessee Valley leads me to ask the Congress for legislation necessary to enlist this project in the service of the people.

It is clear that the Muscle Shoals development is but a small part of the potential public usefulness of the entire Tennessee River. Such use, if envisioned in its entirety, transcends mere power development: it enters the wide fields of flood control, soil erosion, afforestation, elimination from agricultural use of marginal lands, and distribution and diversification of industry. In short, this power development of war days leads logically to national planning for a complete river watershed involving many States and the future lives and welfare of millions. It touches and gives life to all forms of human concerns.

I therefore suggest to the Congress legislation to create a Tennessee Valley Authority—a corporation clothed with the power of Government but possessed of the flexibility and initiative of a private enterprise. It should be charged with the broadest duty of planning for the proper use, conservation, and development of the natural resources of the Tennessee River drainage basin and its adjoining territory for the general social and economic welfare of the Nation. This authority should also be clothed with the necessary power to carry these plans into effect. Its duty should be the rehabilitation of the Muscle Shoals development and the coordination of it with the wider plan.

Many hard lessons have taught us the human waste that results from lack of planning. Here and there a few wise cities and counties have looked ahead and planned. But our Nation has "just grown." It is time to extend planning to a wider field, in this instance comprehending in one great project many States directly concerned with the basin of one of our greatest rivers.

This in a true sense is a return to the spirit and vision of the pioneer. If we are successful here we can march on, step by step, in a like development of other great natural territorial units within our borders.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 10, 1933.

SESSIONS OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs may have leave to sit during the sessions of the House for the remainder of the week, beginning tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FARM-MORTGAGE LEGISLATION

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture may have until midnight tonight to file its report on the farm mortgage bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I understand that that bill is coming up tomorrow.

Mr. BYRNS. It is our hope that it will come up tomorrow.

Mr. SNELL. But the report is not ready?

Mr. BYRNS. No; but it will be very shortly. I know of nothing else to come before the House.

Mr. SNELL. Are the hearings printed on that bill so that we can get the information upon it? That is all that I am interested in.

Mr. BYRNS. I am informed by a member of the committee that they have had hearings, but he does not believe that they have been printed.

Mr. SNELL. It seems to me that on such an important proposition as that, involving a matter of $2,000,000,000, establishing an important policy on the part of the Government, running for many years, we ought to have definite hearings and a report which the House itself can study.

Mr. BYRNS. If we do not get this unanimous consent, the bill cannot be reported until tomorrow.

Mr. SNELL. Oh, I am willing to give the gentleman unanimous consent. I am not objecting to that, but this is so important that I think we ought to have an opportunity to study it and look it over very carefully before we adopt it. I expect to support the measure, but, nevertheless, I want to know what I am supporting.

Mr. BYRNS. I think it is the intention of the chairman of that committee, with whom I talked this morning, to consume at least 2 days in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Will it be considered under the general rules of the House?

Mr. BYRNS. That remains to be determined. I have not had an opportunity to talk with him and other gentlemen respecting that. Personally I have no objection to that.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman include in his request the right as well for any minority member to present minority views, so that they may be protected in their rights?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; I will include that.

Mr. BLANTON. To be printed in the same pamphlet.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I include that in my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture may have until 12 o'clock tonight to file a report upon the farm mortgage bill, and that minority views may be filed at the same time, to be included in the same pamphlet. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until 12 o'clock tonight to file a report upon the farm mortgage bill, if they have one.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BRENNAN, for 1 week, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 32 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, April 11, 1933, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE

TUESDAY, APRIL 11, 1933

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, whose most dear Son went not up to joy but first He suffered pain, and entered not into glory before He was crucified, give us this day a clearer vision of the meaning of the cross, as its shadow falls athwart the pathway of our earthly pilgrimage.

Grant unto these Thy servants, folded together in the bonds of fellowship and dedicated to a common purpose, that they may become true interpreters of the mind of Christ in whatsoever way Thou deemest best. Come to us now through the silence; and though duty bids us shun the lonely way, draw near us in the crowd and speak to our souls, above the tumult, words of forgiveness, power, and cleansing, for the sake of One who at this hour hung upon the cross that all mankind might find in Him the way of life and peace. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the Journal.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, March 13, 1933, when, on request of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

He also presented the petition of the congregation of Temple Beth-El, of Great Neck, N.Y., praying for action by the Government of the United States to demonstrate to the German Government a sense of outrage and moral indignation at the distress and alleged persecution of the Jews in Germany, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Abraham Miller Association, Inc., of Brooklyn, N.Y., protesting against alleged atrocities perpetrated against the Jews in Germany and appealing to the Government to take necessary steps in the premises, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Lady Superior Association at Encampment Temple, New York City, N.Y., favoring the passage of the so-called "Copeland-Dickstein bill", removing the remaining discriminations against women in nationality, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Buffalo (N.Y.) Youth Peace Committee, protesting against the further construction of dirigibles by the Government and the expenditure of moneys for armament, and also favoring the abandonment of the Macon before it is put into commission, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I request unanimous consent to have set forth in full in the RECORD and appropriately referred the telegram which I hold in my hand, from Mr. H. J. Baker, the director of extension service of the New Jersey Agricultural College.

This message is inspired by the report or rumor that the Federal annual appropriation for the support of agricultural extension work, the agricultural experiment station, and the agricultural college in New Jersey is to be discontinued. And I am anxious thus to bring to the attention of the Senate this serious menace to our State in this respect.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW BRUNSWICK, N.J., April 8, 1933.

Hon. W. W. BARBOUR,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

Our county agricultural agent in Monmouth County, Mr. Douglass, tells me he saw you last night and that you wish to have a statement of the amount of Federal money coming to New Jersey annually for the support of agricultural extension work, the agricultural experiment station, and the agricultural college. The Federal appropriations for New Jersey for this fiscal year are as follows: For the extension service, $138,000; for the experiment station, $90,000; for the college of agriculture, $50,000. To have these funds entirely eliminated would necessitate the abandonment of a large amount of important research and practically eliminate the extension service, and would mean the dismissal of a large number of our scientifically trained staff, seriously hampering the work of our existing agricultural institutions at a time when agriculture is in distress. This would be a calamity. The emergency relief to agriculture can function most effectively by maintaining and strengthening the extension service and the scientific staff of our agricultural college and experiment stations. Loss of Federal appropriations might also result in the loss of State and county appropriations, thereby entirely eliminating these institutions. Your support in maintaining these Federal funds will be a great service to the State and Nation.

H. J. BAKER,
Director of Extension Service,
New Jersey Agricultural College.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHEELER presented a communication from the Wallace (Idaho) Board of Trade, embodying a memorial addressed by that body to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WALLACE, IDAHO, March 16, 1933.

The Wallace (Idaho) Board of Trade bespeaks your earnest consideration of the memorial presented herewith with respect to the remonetization of silver. If your views agree with ours, we request that you so inform the United States Chamber of Commerce, particularly stressing the necessity of action at the Washington, D.C., meeting of the national board next May.

We further presume upon your interest in silver to suggest that you inform your Senators and Representatives in Congress of any action that your body may take.

It is our opinion that inflation must come if we are to secure fair living prices for our raw commodities; that is, for the primary source of all wealth—the products of the farms, the forests, and the mines. There are but three methods of inflation:

(a) The issuance of fiat money.
(b) The deflation of gold.
(c) The remonetization of silver.

The issuance of fiat money is fraught with so many dangers which have been demonstrated in the past that the use of this method at the present time is unthinkable. The devaluation of gold will lead to endless legal complications, and produce two kinds of instruments—those payable in gold of the old standard of fineness and those payable at the new standard of fineness.

It seems to us, therefore, that the remonetization of silver is the only safe method of providing a more adequate metallic basis for our monetary system.

Yours very truly,

WALLACE (IDAHO) BOARD OF TRADE,
By LEO J. HOBAN,
HENRY L. DAY,
M. J. FLOHR,
Committee.

[Memorial]

To the Chamber of Commerce of the United States:

We, your memorialists, the Board of Trade of Wallace, Idaho, during the regular session of March 8, 1933, passed without dissenting vote, and now most respectfully present, the following petition, preamble, and resolutions, to wit:

"Whereas our beloved country, the United States of America, emerged from the terrible World War in 1918 the richest, best-equipped, most powerful, and most enterprising nation on earth; and

"Whereas this situation has been reversed within a short period, and our country is now in the throes of unemployment, suffering, bankruptcy, and ruin unparalleled in her history. Thirteen million or more wageworkers of the Nation are now unemployed, millions more are working part time and at greatly reduced wages and salaries. Mortgages on thousands of farms have been foreclosed and the farmers driven from their lands. Social and industrial distress is rampant throughout the land. These facts are of common knowledge; and

"Whereas these appalling conditions are steadily becoming more severe and the distress of our people more general, and it is evident that ways and means must be speedily provided to rehabilitate the commerce of the Nation if general bankruptcy, ruin, and anarchy are to be avoided; and

"Whereas the relief measures heretofore taken have proven to be either failures or at best only palliatives; the Nation now faces the possible bankruptcy of many railroads, which in turn will react on insurance companies, savings and loan associations, and other fiduciary organizations, corporations, companies, firms, and individuals which have invested in railroad stocks and bonds; and

"Whereas 60 years' experience with the single gold standard has culminated in the present national financial distress, unparalleled in the history of our country; our entire commercial structure of uncounted billions being now pyramided upon a scant $4,000,000,000 of gold hidden in the vaults and hoarded in the homes; and

"Whereas the failure of the single gold standard is emphasized by the action of the Secretary of the Treasury in forcing into the United States Treasury all the gold bullion, gold coins, and gold certificates now in the possession of corporations and individuals in the United States, and offering in payment therefor only 'debt' money; that is, currency backed by Government obligations, the interest-bearing promises of the United States to pay; and

"Whereas it is universally conceded that the lost buying power of the people must be restored if a cataclysm is to be avoided; and

"Whereas, in the judgment of your memorialists, there is only one way to afford the immediate relief demanded, and that is by the prompt remonetization of silver in the United States. This action would compel an honest and orderly inflation of wages, salaries, prices, and rates so urgently required; it would, in addition, carry no interest charge, as is done by the flood of paper currency based on debt, with which the Federal Reserve banks are being inundated. It would valorize the bonds of those countries of North, South, and Central America which are now so badly depreciated. It would increase the buying power by fivefold of one half the human race residing in Asia and would tend to restore the world's trade equilibrium now so badly unbalanced: Now, therefore, in order that we may avert further catastrophe, the magnitude of which no man can foresee, be it

"Resolved by the Wallace (Idaho) Board of Trade, That we most respectfully urge the Chamber of Commerce of the United States to immediately demand that Congress remonetize silver and that a law be enacted providing for the free and unlimited coinage of silver on a fixed ratio to gold, and in the manner established for the coinage of gold, and providing that a gold dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold nine tenths fine and a silver dollar consisting of 412½ grains of silver nine tenths fine shall be the standard unit of value and shall be full legal tender in the legal payment of all debts, public and private, and that all forms of money issued or coined by the United States of America shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard, and that it shall be the mandatory duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity; and be it further

"Resolved by the Wallace (Idaho) Board of Trade, That we most respectfully urge the United States Chamber of Commerce to endorse Senate bill 2487, providing for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 and introduced in the United States Senate by Hon. BURTON K. WHEELER, United States Senator from the State of Montana, on January 4, 1932, as we believe the passage of this bill will be the quickest and best way of giving relief to our distressed people and retrieving, insofar as possible, the tremendous loss and damage already incurred; and be it further

"Resolved, That this memorial be made a subject for discussion at the annual meeting in May 1933 of the United States Chamber of Commerce at Washington, D.C."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are in order.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON IRRIGATION AND RECLAMATION

Mr. BRATTON, from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, to which was referred the bill (S. 317) authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make advances to the reclamation fund, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 22) thereon.

REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEE TO AUDIT AND CONTROL THE CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE SENATE

Mr. BYRNES. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report sundry resolutions and ask unanimous consent for their immediate consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator if he will not allow us to get through with the routine morning business before he asks for the consideration of the resolutions reported by him?

Mr. BYRNES. They are merely formal resolutions, I will say to the Senator, and will take no time.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of certain resolutions reported by him from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read the first resolution so reported.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States, submitting a nomination, was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

REFERENCE OF BILLS AFFECTING JURISDICTION OF CONSTITUTIONAL COURTS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 24) submitted by Mr. McCARRAN on March 13, 1933, as follows:

Resolved, That all bills introduced during the Seventy-third Congress which affect the jurisdiction of constitutional courts shall, before passage by the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

6-HOUR DAY AND 5-DAY WEEK

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, if it is now in order, I desire to make a motion to take up the motion to reconsider the votes by which Senate bill 158 was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, on Thursday last.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the motion to reconsider the votes whereby Senate bill 158 was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Court of Impeachment is to convene at 12:30 o'clock, I do not know whether it is desired to proceed with the discussion of this question at the present time or not.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes.

Mr. REED. Have the papers in connection with Senate bill 158 gone to the House or are they still held in the Senate?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I may say to the Senator that I made inquiry about that before making the motion and found that the papers had not been transmitted to the House. Had they been transmitted to the House, I would have embodied in the motion a request that they be returned.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

PROTECTION OF GOVERNMENT RECORDS

Mr. PITTMAN. There is a bill on the calendar reported out by the Foreign Relations Committee at the request of the State Department. It is the bill H.R. 4220, for the protection of Government records. It is undoubtedly an emergency matter. I do not anticipate that it will involve very much debate. It is a bill to protect code messages and correspondence between diplomats of foreign countries and their governments. The bill as it came from the House has been changed entirely by the Committee on Foreign Relations. What I desire to do is to ask unanimous consent that consideration of the pending motion be temporarily laid aside to see whether or not we can get action on the bill immediately. I submit that request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent to suspend consideration of the pending motion of the Senator from Florida for reconsideration of the vote by which Senate bill 158 was passed, and to proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 22. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Nevada that I have no desire at all to delay the consideration of the bill to which he refers. There are one or two observations I do wish to make respecting it. At 12:30 o'clock the Senate will convene as a Court of Impeachment. Could not the Senator wait until those proceedings are concluded and then take up his bill as he desires? We have now but 13 minutes until the court meets, and possibly we might occupy that much time or a little more in the consideration of his bill. I shall not object, after the proceedings of the court, to considering the measure referred to by the Senator from Nevada if it is desired by the Senator, in order to bring about its passage this afternoon.

Mr. PITTMAN. How long does the Senator think the proceedings at 12:30 o'clock will take?

Mr. JOHNSON. I should say probably half an hour, but I am not qualified to speak in respect to that matter. Possibly the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] or the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] could give us some idea of the time that may be occupied by the Court of Impeachment proceedings today.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, of course, we do not know at this time just the form of the answer of the respondent; but I anticipate that the proceedings today in the Court of Impeachment will take not over an hour and a quarter.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will it not do to defer the request of the Senator from Nevada until the court rises?

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask unanimous consent that when the Court of Impeachment rises the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 22, the bill to which I have referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I could not consent to that request. I think the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] is entitled to consideration of his motion as is the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. The matter was discussed yesterday, and it was agreed to let it come up today during the morning hour. I think it right that those Senators should have consideration and disposition of the pending motions. The proposal made by the Senator from Nevada would exclude consideration of the motion of the Senator from Florida today. Therefore I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

6-HOUR DAY AND 30-HOUR WEEK—MOTION TO RECONSIDER

The Senate resumed consideration of the motion entered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (S. 158) to prevent interstate commerce in certain commodities and articles produced or manufactured in industrial activities in which persons are employed more than 5 days per week or 6 hours per day.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, my principal object in moving reconsideration of the vote by which we passed Senate bill 158, commonly known as the "Black bill" or the "6-hour day and 5-day week bill", is that we may give some further consideration to a feature of the measure which I regard as of interest to American labor. I am for shorter hours of labor and for good wages, and I am for the feature of the bill that may produce such results. The original bill as passed by the Senate discriminates against American labor and in favor of foreign labor. It discriminates against American manufacturers in the interest of foreign manufacturers.

What I desire to do, if the Senate reconsiders its vote on the bill by which the bill was passed, is that I want to offer an amendment which will provide that any manufactured goods which were made by the hands of American labor and which were manufactured by American manufacturers, being placed in interstate commerce under restrictions, shall not be handicapped by having the door left wide open for the products of foreign manufacturers and foreign labor to come in and absorb a considerable quantity of American trade because of the discrimination against American labor and American manufacture, which made it more difficult to sell articles made by American laborers and in American factories.

There can be no question that if we throw further restrictions around the manufacture of American products and do not impose similar restrictions or limitations upon foreign products imported into the United States, we will concentrate and lessen the market for American products; and upon the other hand, we will widen and extend the market for products that are made by the hands of foreign labor. I cannot quite understand why an American Congress should pass a bill for the promotion and the advancement of the interests of foreign manufacturers and of foreign laborers to the detriment and at the expense of American labor. Why treat the foreign factory and foreign laborer with favoritism? I shall not do so.

Mr. President, I have always been the friend of the laboring man in his endeavor to obtain better hours and a better wage, to obtain better working conditions, to obtain stronger and better restrictions regarding child labor. I have been a friend of the laboring man throughout my public career. I recall that in my own State, when the question of placing upon the statute books the laws prohibiting child labor, by coincidence I happened to be Governor of Florida at the time. As a candidate for Governor of that State I had advocated a child labor law. When I became Governor of the State, I threw all the power and influence that I had behind and in favor of the enactment of laws which would protect children against abuses which might exist under the system at that time extant throughout the manufacturing industry of our State. We succeeded in having such a law enacted. It was not a perfect law, but I do not know of any such law that is perfect, at least according to our own individual viewpoint. I have sometimes thought and have sometimes said that I believe if someone offered the Lord's Prayer to be incorporated in our statutes, someone else would rise and offer an amendment to it and endeavor to effect a change in it.

We enacted our child labor law. I was largely instrumental in bringing about its enactment. I appointed the first labor inspector to inspect the sanitary conditions in our factories, to see that there were no violations of the restrictions placed upon child labor. Since I have been a Member of the United States Senate, in every instance I have been the friend of the laboring man and I am thankful and grateful to say that he has been my friend. I am now here again standing for his interests and for his protection against one of the most drastic efforts that I know of to discriminate against his rights in favor of the foreign labor and factory.

The laboring man in this country is entitled to good sanitary conditions in the factories where he works. He is entitled to a reasonable wage. I have always favored a reasonable wage and have often worked with the American Federation of Labor to secure such wages. I have always stood for reducing the hours of labor. But I cannot understand the philosophy or fairness of a policy which says that we will lessen the hours of labor for the American laborer, that we will place restrictions upon the industries in which he is engaged that will probably operate to his advantage in the maintenance of the industries in which he is engaged and at the same time allow the foreigner to take up all those advantages.

I voted for the shortening of the hours of labor prescribed in the bill. I want now merely to have an opportunity to see that the benefits of such reductions go to American labor. We are doing a great many things here now purely as a matter of experimentation. I remember when the first bill came up in the Senate at this special session there was considerable enthusiasm exhibited by most of the Members of the Senate in support of the bill, but within the last 2 or 3 days, since they have begun to hear from the men who defended our country on the battlefields that their compensation has been cut off, that their hospital facilities have been withdrawn, some of them do not seem to exhibit such enthusiasm as they did when they supported bill no. 1 and the beneficent provisions which were contained in that measure.

My prediction is that we are going to find this to be true in regard to much of the legislation. I believe there is a great spirit of cooperation among all the Members of both Houses of Congress. There is a sincere and earnest desire on the part of the entire administration to do the very best possible to bring about better conditions in the country. But even with all that patriotism, with all that spirit of cooperation, with all that desire to lift the country from its condition of depression, we are naturally going to make some mistakes.

I think one of the most serious mistakes would be to say that we are going to treat the laboring people of this country so they will only have to work 5 or 6 hours a day, that they will only have to work 5 days a week so far as those engaged in industrial occupations are concerned, while the poor farmer, the dairymen, and workmen of that class will still be required to do their drudgery of 8 or 10 or probably 12 hours a day, which is outrageous. I am willing and glad to give the laboring man the benefit of shorter hours with the hope that some benefit will be enjoyed as a result. Let us try to benefit all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida will please suspend, the hour fixed for the Court of Impeachment having arrived.

IMPEACHMENT OF HAROLD LOUDERBACK

At 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p.m. the Secretary to the Minority, Carl A. Loeffler, appeared and said: I have the honor to announce the managers on the part of the House of Representatives to conduct the impeachment proceedings in the impeachment of Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The managers on the part of the House of Representatives will be conducted to the seats assigned them in the area in front of the Secretary's desk.

The managers were conducted to seats provided in the space in front of the Secretary's desk, on the left of the Chair, namely: Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS, of Texas; Hon. RANDOLPH PERKINS, of New Jersey; Hon. GORDON BROWNING, of Tennessee; Hon. U. S. GUYER, of Kansas; Hon. J. EARL MAJOR, of Illinois; and Hon. LAWRENCE LEWIS, of Colorado.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 12:30 o'clock, to which the Senate, sitting as a court in the impeachment of Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, took a recess, having arrived, the Sergeant at Arms will make proclamation.

The SERGEANT AT ARMS. Hear ye! Hear ye! Hear ye! All persons are commanded to keep silence on pain of imprisonment while the Senate of the United States is sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the names of the Senators who have not been sworn.

The legislative clerk called the names of Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. CAREY, Mr. CUTTING, Mr. ERICKSON, Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. METCALF, Mr. NORBECK, Mr. SCHALL, Mr. SHIPSTEAD, and Mr. WHEELER, who, with the exception of Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. SCHALL, and Mr. WHEELER, advanced to the desk, and the oath was administered to them by the Vice President.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal of the previous session of the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment may be dispensed with, and that the Journal of that session may be approved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify the counsel for respondent.

At 12 o'clock and 32 minutes p.m. the respondent, Harold Louderback, and his counsel, James M. Hanley, Esq., and Walter H. Linforth, Esq., both of San Francisco, Calif., entered the Chamber and were conducted to the seats assigned them in the space in front of the Secretary's desk on the right of the Chair.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution, which I ask may be read and considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT.

Whereas on March 13, 1933, John N. Garner, Vice President and President of the Senate, acting under authority of the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, and in accordance with the Rules for Impeachment Trials, issued a writ of summons to Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, commanding him to appear before the Senate of the United States of America at their Chamber in the city of Washington on the 11th day of April 1933, at 12:30 o'clock afternoon, to answer to articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, and addressed to Chesley W. Jurney, Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, a precept commanding him to serve true and attested copies of said writ of summons and precept upon the said Harold Louderback personally or by leaving same at his usual place of abode or at his usual place of business; and

Whereas since the recess of the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, the said Chesley W. Jurney, as Sergeant at Arms, acting upon a suggestion of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, with a view to securing a waiver of personal service of said writ of summons as required by the precept, communicated by telegraph with the said Harold Louderback, who consented to such waiver, and who subsequently forwarded to said Chesley W. Jurney, as Sergeant at Arms, a waiver, in writing, of personal service of said writ of summons, signed by him and witnessed on the 28th day of March 1933, agreeing voluntarily to appear in person before the Senate of the United States at the time and place specified in said writ of summons and acknowledging receipt of true and attested copies of said writ of summons and precept, transmitted to him by the said Chesley W. Jurney, Sergeant at Arms: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the action of the said Chesley W. Jurney, Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, in securing waiver of personal service of said writ of summons upon the said Harold Louderback be, and the same is hereby, ratified and approved; that the delivery, by registered mail, of true and attested copies of the said writ of summons and precept to the said Harold Louderback, and his acceptance thereof, be deemed and taken to have been a satisfactory and sufficient compliance by the said Chesley W. Jurney, Sergeant at Arms, with the said precept, and that the said Chesley W. Jurney, as Sergeant at Arms, be, and he is hereby, authorized to make return of said writ of summons and precept accordingly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is agreed to.

The Secretary will read the return of the Sergeant at Arms to the summons directed to be served.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
OFFICE OF THE SERGEANT AT ARMS.

The foregoing writ of summons, addressed to Harold Louderback, and the foregoing precept, addressed to me, were duly served upon the said Harold Louderback by the transmittal, by registered mail, to the said Harold Louderback of true and attested copies of the same, and by his receipt thereof, as shown in the attached waiver by the said Harold Louderback of personal service of summons, said waiver being made a part of this return.

CHESLEY W. JURNEY,
Sergeant at Arms, United States Senate.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT IN THE CASE OF HAROLD LOUDERBACK, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

Waiver of personal service of Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California.

I, Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, do hereby waive personal service of summons issued on the 13th day of March 1933, by Hon. John N. Garner, Vice President and President of the Senate, which commands me to appear before the Senate of the United States on April 11, 1933, at 12:30 p.m., to answer specific articles of impeachment exhibited to the Senate by the House of Representatives, and agree to voluntarily appear in person before the Senate of the United States at the aforesaid time.

I acknowledge receipt of a true and attested copy of the writ of summons issued in this case, together with a like copy of the precept.

Witness my signature this 28th day of March 1933 at the city of San Francisco, State of California.

HAROLD LOUDERBACK,
Respondent.

Signature of witness:
JAMES M. HANLEY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In view of the waiver of personal service of summons by the respondent, without objection, the administration of the oath to the Sergeant at Arms will be dispensed with.

The Sergeant at Arms will make proclamation.

The Sergeant at Arms made proclamation, as follows:

Harold Louderback! Harold Louderback! Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California: Appear and answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against you.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair advises the counsel for the respondent that the Senate is now sitting for the trial of Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, upon the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives, and will hear his answer thereto.

Mr. LINFORTH. Mr. President, at this time Harold Louderback appears in person and by counsel and presents a written appearance, which we ask to be filed and read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the appearance.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. HAROLD LOUDERBACK, APPEARANCE OF RESPONDENT

The respondent, Harold Louderback, having been served with a summons requiring him to appear before the Senate of the United States of America at their Chamber in the city of Washington, on the 11th day of April 1933, at 12:30 o'clock afternoon, to answer certain articles of impeachment presented against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, now appears in his proper person and also by his counsel, who are instructed by this respondent to inform the Senate that respondent is ready to file his answer to said articles of impeachment at this time.

Dated this 11th day of April 1933.

HAROLD LOUDERBACK.

WALTER H. LINFORTH,
JAMES M. HANLEY,
Counsel for Respondent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The paper will be placed on file.

Counsel for the respondent may make a statement, or the respondent in person may do so.

Mr. LINFORTH. Mr. President, at this time the respondent, Harold Louderback, files and presents his answer to the articles of impeachment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will counsel speak a little louder?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is impossible to hear counsel.

Mr. LINFORTH. Mr. President, at this time, having appeared, the respondent, Harold Louderback, presents his answer to the articles of impeachment and asks that it may be read and filed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The answer of the respondent will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

ANSWER OF RESPONDENT HAROLD LOUDERBACK (S.DOC. NO. 21)

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. HAROLD LOUDERBACK, UPON ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT PRESENTED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Answer of respondent Harold Louderback to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives of the United States

ANSWER TO ARTICLE I

For answer to the first article the respondent says that this honorable court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the first of said articles of impeachment so exhibited and presented against him, because, he says, the facts set forth in said first article do not, if true, constitute an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor as defined in the Constitution of the United States, and that therefore the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, should not further entertain the charge contained in said first article.

And now, not waiving the foregoing plea to the jurisdiction of the honorable Senate of the United States, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, as to said first article, said respondent saving to himself all advantages of exception to said first article, for answer thereto saith:

I

Admits that he is now and was at all times mentioned in said article a duly appointed, qualified, and acting judge of the United States District Court for the Northern District of California.

II

Further answering said article, the respondent admits, denies, and alleges as follows:

Admits that on the 11th day of March 1930, by an order duly made and entered in that certain action then pending in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, in which Gardner M. Olmstead was plaintiff and Russell Colvin Co. was defendant, he appointed one Addison G. Strong as equity receiver.

Admits that on the 13th day of March 1930 by an order duly made and entered in said action he revoked and set aside the order appointing said Addison G. Strong as receiver in said action.

Alleges that the facts and circumstances surrounding and leading up to the making of the said order on the 13th day of March 1930 setting aside the appointment of the said Addison G. Strong were as follows, and not otherwise:

On the 10th day of March 1930 a bill of complaint was filed in the office of the clerk of said court wherein Gardner M. Olmstead was the plaintiff and Russell-Colvin Co., a copartnership, and others were defendants. That in said complaint, among other things, the appointment of a receiver was prayed for. That in said action Thelen & Marrin were the attorneys for the plaintiff and Sanborn & Roehl, DeLancey C. Smith, and Francis C. Brown were the attorneys for certain defendants. Upon the filing of the said bill of complaint, application was made to this respondent, in chambers, for the appointment of a receiver. At the making of said application the plaintiff was represented by the attorneys aforesaid and the defendants were represented by the said Francis C. Brown. Two of the defendants, partners of said Russell-Colvin Co., were also present in person, at the making of said application. All of said attorneys and said parties so present consented to and requested the appointment of a receiver. At said time there was also present Lloyd W. Dinkelspiel, a member of or connected with the law firm of Heller, Ehrman, White & McAuliffe, who were at that time the regularly retained attorneys for the San Francisco Stock Exchange. That said defendant, Russell-Colvin Co. was and had been engaged in a general stock brokerage and bond business in the city of San Francisco and was a member of said stock exchange, owning a seat therein. That the said Addison G. Strong was the auditor for said stock exchange and had at some time prior thereto audited the books of said Russell-Colvin Co. At the request of all prices present this respondent made the said order appointing the said Addison G. Strong receiver, who at said time was not known personally by respondent but was known to him by reputation. At said time, and for a long time prior thereto, there was in existence a rule of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, which had been adopted by all the members or judges thereof, known as general rule no. 53, which in part was and is as follows:

"Receivers shall employ counsel only after obtaining an order of the court therefor"; and said rule at and prior to said 13th day of March 1930 had always been construed by the judges of said court to mean that such counsel should be satisfactory to and acceptable to the judge of said court. Upon the appointment of the said Addison G. Strong as such receiver, he desired to appoint as his attorneys the law firm of Heller, Ehrman, White & McAuliffe, so as aforesaid the attorneys for said San Francisco Stock Exchange. For the reasons aforesaid, respondent was reluctant to confirm or accept the appointment of said firm of attorneys so representing said stock exchange as attorney for said receiver, having already appointed as receiver the auditor of said stock exchange, and suggested to said receiver the appointment by him of other counsel, suggesting to him the names of John Douglas Short, of the firm or connected with the law firm of Keyes & Erskine, the law firm of Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, the law firm of Sullivan, Sullivan & Theodore J. Roche, and the law firm of Cushing & Cushing, all of said firms and the members thereof, being reputable practitioners of high standing and character, practicing their profession at the city of San Francisco, but said receiver, Addison G. Strong, in a defiant and arbitrary manner, declined and refused to have or employ any counsel to represent him as such receiver other than the said firm so representing the said stock exchange. Accordingly, your respondent deemed it advisable to make and did make the order referred to in said article I, removing from office the said Addison G. Strong as such receiver.

Respondent denies that in so discharging the said Addison G. Strong as such receiver he acted willfully, tyrannically, and/or oppressively, and respondent denies that he ever attempted to force and coerce, or force or coerce the said Addison G. Strong to appoint as his said attorney in said matter of proceeding the said John Douglas Short, or that he ever improperly or otherwise or at all did attempt to cause the said Addison G. Strong to appoint the said John Douglas Short as his attorney in said matter by any promise or promises of allowance of large fees, or by any threat or threats of reduced fees in the event of the refusal of the said Addison G. Strong to so appoint the said John Douglas Short.

III

Further answering said article I, this respondent states that upon the removal of the said Addison G. Strong as such receiver he appointed in his place and stead one H. B. Hunter, who at that time was manager of the brokerage department of the prominent firm of William Cavalier & Co., said company doing a general stock brokerage and investment banking business in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California.

Subsequent to the appointment of the said H. B. Hunter as such receiver, after petition filed by him therefor, respondent authorized the appointment by him of attorneys so to represent him as such receiver and ratified the appointment by him of John Douglas Short and the firm of Keyes & Erskine as such attorneys.

Respondent denies that the said John Douglas Short was so appointed attorney for said receiver at the instance, suggestion, or demand of W. S. Leake, referred to in said article I as Sam Leake, or that respondent improperly, otherwise, or at all, used his office and power of district judge in his own personal interest by causing the appointment of the said John Douglas Short as attorney for the said receiver.

Respondent denies that the said John Douglas Short, or the said Keyes & Erskine, received large and exorbitant fees, or large or exorbitant fees for any service by them, or any of them, rendered said receiver in said action.

And respondent further denies that he ever knew that the said W. S. Leake did receive certain or any fees, gratuities, and/or loans, directly or indirectly, from the said John Douglas Short, amounting approximately to the sum of $1,200, or any other sum or amount whatever.

Respondent denies upon and according to his information and belief that the said W. S. Leake ever did receive certain or any fees, gratuities, and/or loans, directly or indirectly, from the said John Douglas Short, amounting approximately to the sum of $1,200, or any other sum or amount whatever.

And further answering said article I, respondent alleges, with reference to the fees allowed for the services of the attorneys for said receiver, as follows:

That respondent granted and allowed to John Douglas Short and Messrs. Keyes and Erskine, as attorneys for said receiver, as compensation for the services rendered by them the sum of $46,250, and made an order to such effect on or about the 17th day of March 1931, and thereafter, on or about the 14th day of November 1931, an additional amount of $5,000. That said allowance of $46,250 was made upon the following circumstances, and not otherwise, namely:

On or about the 7th day of March 1931 said attorneys for said receiver filed in the matter of said action a written application for an allowance to compensate them for the services theretofore rendered by them. Notice of the hearing of said application was given to all parties in interest. Said application came on regularly for hearing before respondent, as such judge, in open court, and the hearing thereof was had on the 14th, 16th, and 17th days of March 1931. That on said hearing all of the parties to said proceeding and a large number of the creditors of said Russell-Colvin Co. were represented by counsel. On said hearing evidence as to the value of said services was introduced. Mr. John L. McNab, upon examination under oath, testified that in his opinion the value of said services was somewhere between $50,000 and $75,000, and added that he thought $75,000 was a fair fee; Mr. Albert A. Rosenshine testified said services were of a value of $65,000; Mr. Henry A. Jacobs testified that the value of said services was the sum of $55,000; Mr. Sidney M. Ehrman, of the law firm heretofore mentioned, placed a value of $25,000 upon said services. All of the attorneys above mentioned were and are reputable practitioners of their profession in San Francisco, and no other evidence by attorneys as to the value of said services was introduced.

That on the third day of said hearing, namely, March 17, 1931, upon the hearing of said application being resumed, respondent was advised, in open court, by counsel participating in the hearing of the objections to said application, that the parties in interest had agreed among themselves upon an allowance in the sum of $46,250 for the services so rendered by the attorneys for the receiver, subject to the approval of respondent as such judge, and subject to the right of said counsel to thereafter apply for compensation for such services as might thereafter be rendered. Thereupon, as shown by the notes of the phonographic reporter, the following proceedings took place insofar as the same referred to the amount that should be allowed to the attorneys for the receiver:

"The COURT. This arrangement is within the scope of what I think proper, although I will be frank with you gentlemen and say that while it is not what I would have made it, if this matter was pressed in this present form, I am satisfied with it if everybody else is, and apparently everybody else is satisfied—it being within the range of a proper fee—I think it is satisfactory to the court to accept that, and without proceeding further with the hearing in view of the fact that everyone is apparently satisfied, or has shown no objection to this matter, or no objection has been offered by anyone who has been participating in this hearing, I will allow the sums which have been mentioned. * * * I will allow $46,250 to the attorneys, John D. Short and Keyes & Erskine."

And said record shows that before the respondent, sitting as judge of said court made said announcement, he inquired of those present: "If there is anybody objecting to that (referring to the amount so placed as the amount to be allowed said attorneys, and other matters then under consideration) representing creditors, they should say so now." And the record shows that no one in response thereto offered any objection.

And respondent further shows that the said allowance was made under and in accordance with the foregoing stipulation or arrangement entered into between the said parties. No exception was taken to said order by any interested party, and to the knowledge of affiant, thereafter no objection was ever made thereto, and no appeal was ever taken therefrom.

Respondent further shows that thereafter on the 14th day of November 1931 said attorneys for said receiver, upon petition filed by them, and after a full hearing had thereon, at which no objections whatever were made or filed, the sum of $5,000 was allowed for services rendered by said attorneys to said receiver, since the making of the order so allowing the said sum of $46,250, and no appeal was ever taken from this later order.

Respondent further shows that the records on file in said action disclose that the appraised value of all securities belonging to said firm of Russell-Colvin & Co. and to its customers was the sum of $2,111,536.24, as of March 11, 1930, the date of the commencement of the said receivership; that the appraised value of the firm's securities, not including other assets, was over one half million dollars; that 679 claims were filed with said receiver for cash and securities totaling $1,722,402.51, and that the amount of bank loans and repurchase agreements liquidated in said receivership was $971,870.94; that the said receiver and his said counsel settled each of said claims without employing a special master or expert accountant; that the administration of said estate resulted in the payment to customers of $385,745.70 in cash and the delivery to customers of securities of the value of $505,977.39; that the creditors of said firm entitled to preference, and the customers of said firm entitled to priority, each received 100 percent of their claims in cash and securities; that the ordinary margin customers of said firm, not entitled to priority, received about 56 percent of their claims in cash and securities; that said ordinary margin customers of said firm were relegated to the position of general customers for a portion of their claims; that the claims of general creditors of the firm, including the claims of margin customers who were relegated to the position of general creditors for a portion of their claims, amounted to $505,277.44, of which amount $152,733.97 represented the claim of general creditors not customers, and $352,533.47 represented the claims of margin customers who were relegated to the position of general creditors; that the general creditors had received 28 percent of their claims with a prospect of additional dividends of about 12 percent; that the customers and creditors of said firm had received securities and cash to the amount of $828,000, an average of about 65 percent for all customers and creditors; that only 21 objections were filed to the receiver's report by customers and creditors, and these objections or exceptions were summarily settled at hearings before the court or referee, with the result that the administration of the estate was substantially completed without protracted litigation having been instituted by any dissatisfied customer; that there was completed in 18 months the work of tracing the moneys and securities of said estate and marshaling its assets and distributing to creditors the moneys and securities to which they were entitled, with the exception of certain dividends thereafter to be paid, and the administration of the estate was most expeditious for one of this character.

IV

Further answering said article I, this respondent admits and alleges as follows, to wit:

Admits that on or about the 21st day of September 1929 the said W. S. Leake, in the manner hereinafter set forth, and not otherwise, obtained a room for respondent at the Fairmont Hotel in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, and made arrangements for registering said room in his, W. S. Leake's name.

Admits that under said arrangement said room was to be charged by the management of said hotel to and in the name of the said W. S. Leake, and that respondent was to pay monthly to said hotel, through the said W. S. Leake, the amount of said hotel's charges for said room.

And, in this behalf, this respondent alleges that said arrangement was made under the following circumstances, and not otherwise, that is to say—

Said W. S. Leake was at the said time, and for many years prior thereto had been, a close friend of respondent and was at said time residing, and for many years prior thereto had resided at said hotel with his family, consisting of his wife; that on the date aforesaid, and for some time prior thereto, unhappy differences existed between this respondent and his wife, which, on the date last aforesaid, culminated in respondent separating from his said wife and in temporarily taking up his abode at the said Fairmont Hotel. That on the date aforesaid, upon going to said hotel, respondent consulted with his said friend, advising him of his said separation and confiding in him his desire to avoid, as far as possible, newspaper notoriety that might be caused by knowledge of said separation, and inquired of his said friend whether or not it was possible to obtain accommodations in said hotel without it being generally and publicly known that respondent was staying thereat separate and apart from his said wife. Thereupon the said W. S. Leake arranged with said hotel for accommodations of respondent thereat under an arrangement that the same should be furnished in the name of and charged to the said W. S. Leake. Respondent thereafter monthly furnished to the said W. S. Leake the amount of the bills so charged to the said W. S. Leake for the accommodation of said respondent and said amounts were promptly paid by the said W. S. Leake to said hotel management, and received by it with full knowledge of all of the foregoing facts and circumstances.

Respondent further shows that at the time of the making of the said arrangement with said hotel he then had no intention whatever of acquiring any residence in the county of Contra Costa, and at no time prior to the month of April 1930 did respondent have any intention of so acquiring a residence in the county of Contra Costa, State of California.

Respondent further shows that in the month of April 1930 and for some years prior thereto a brother of respondent had his home and resided with his wife at 107 Ardmore Road, Kensington district, Contra Costa County. Said home was and is in the Berkeley Hills, so-called, and just across the Alameda County line and within about 40 minutes' traveling distance to and from the city and county of San Francisco. That in the month of April 1930 respondent, with the consent of his said brother and wife, determined to make his home at the place aforesaid, and in carrying out his intention so to do, on or about the 17th day of April 1930 removed substantially all his personal effects, such as trunks, clothing, and the like, to a room in the said home of his brother, assigned by the latter to him for his use and benefit, leaving in his said room at said Fairmont Hotel such few articles of clothing as he might need in temporarily stopping at said place. Evidencing such intention to so reside at said place and become a resident of said Contra Costa County, respondent, on or about the 17th day of April 1930, canceled his voting registration in the city and county of San Francisco, and thereafter, and on or about the 18th day of April 1930, registered as a resident and voter of said Contra Costa County, giving his residence as such at the home of his said brother, and at said time was actually living and residing at said place. That in removing to said Contra Costa County and registering therein as a voter as aforesaid, respondent acted with the then bona fide and existing intention of abandoning the city and county of San Francisco as his residence and of making said Contra Costa County his future residence.

And further answering said article I, respondent denies that at the time referred to in said article he was, or ever had been, or is now, under any personal obligation to the said W. S. Leake, and denies that he ever at any time entered into any conspiracy with the said W. S. Leake, with the objects or purposes, or any of them, in said article I set forth, and denies that he ever entered into any conspiracy of any kind or character whatever with the said W. S. Leake.

Respondent denies that he ever improperly and/or unlawfully established a fictitious residence in the county of Contra Costa for the purposes in said article I set forth, or for any other purpose, or at all. And further denies that at any time he ever entered into a conspiracy with the said W. S. Leake to violate the provisions, or any provision, of the political code, or of any other code, in establishing a residence in the county of Contra Costa, as in article I set forth, or otherwise, or at all, and denies that at the time respondent acquired said residence in Contra Costa County, he did not in fact reside in said county.

Respondent denies that his registration as a voter in the said county of Contra Costa was unlawful or made or done pursuant to any conspiracy with the said W. S. Leake. Respondent denies that said registration was for the purpose of falsely creating proof necessary to establish himself a resident of said county in anticipation of any action expected by him to be brought against him, or for the sole purpose of meeting the requirements, or any of them, of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California, providing that all causes of action must be tried in the county in which the defendant resides at the commencement of the action, and respondent further denies that any provision of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California so provides.

Respondent further denies that any act or acts done or performed by him in any of the matters referred to in said article I, constituted a felony, defined by section 42 of the Penal Code of the State of California, or any other code of the State of California, and denies that he was and/or is guilty of a course of conduct improper, oppressive, and/or unlawful and/or is guilty of misbehavior in office as such judge and was and/or is guilty of any misdemeanor in office.

Except as hereinbefore specifically admitted or explained, respondent denies each and every allegation in said article I contained.

ANSWER TO ARTICLE II

For answer to the second article the respondent says that this honorable court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the second of said articles of impeachment so exhibited and presented against him, because, he says, the facts set forth in said second article do not, if true, constitute an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor as defined by the Constitution of the United States, and that therefore the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, should not further entertain the charge contained in said second article.

And now, not waiving the foregoing plea to the jurisdiction of the honorable Senate of the United States, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, as to said second article, said respondent saving to himself all advantages of exception to said second article, for answer thereto saith:

Further answering said article the respondent admits, denies, and alleges as follows:

I

Admits that on or about the 29th day of July 1930 by an order duly made and entered in that certain action then pending in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, in which Helen Lay was plaintiff and Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association was defendant, he appointed Samuel Shortridge, Jr., as receiver therein and ratified or approved the appointment of Marshall Woodworth as attorney for said receiver.

Respondent alleges that the facts and circumstances surrounding and leading up to the appointment of said receiver, and the ratifying of the appointment of said Marshall Woodworth as his attorney, were as follows and not otherwise:

On the 29th day of July 1930 a verified bill of complaint was filed in the office of the clerk of said court, wherein the said Helen Lay was plaintiff and the said Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association was defendant. In said complaint, among other things, the appointment of a receiver was prayed for. In said action Reisner & Deming were the attorneys for the plaintiff and Bronson, Bronson & Slaven were the attorneys for the defendant. Upon the filing of said complaint application was made to this respondent for the appointment of a receiver. At the making of said application the plaintiff was represented by John G. Reisner, of the said firm of Reisner & Deming, and the defendant was represented by Thomas W. Slaven, of the law firm of Bronson, Bronson & Slaven. Counsel so representing both plaintiff and defendant requested the making of an order appointing a receiver. One or the other of said counsel requested the appointment of Samuel M. Shortridge, Jr., as such receiver, and both consented to such appointment, and each signed at said time a written request for the appointment of said Samuel M. Shortridge, Jr., as such receiver, which written request was thereafter, and on the 30th day of July 1930, filed in the office of the clerk of said court.

Respondent further alleges that subsequent to the appointment of the said Samuel M. Shortridge, Jr., as such receiver and on the 2d day of August 1930, he signed and there was thereafter filed in the office of the clerk of said court an order ratifying the appointment of the said Marshall Woodworth as attorney for said receiver.

Respondent further alleges that it appeared from said bill of complaint that plaintiff was a citizen and resident of the State of California, residing within the jurisdiction of said court. That defendant was a reciprocal insurance association organized under the laws of the State of Texas, with assets in a large amount situate in the city of San Francisco and within the jurisdiction of this court, and carrying on and conducting its said insurance business in the State of California, as well as in the State of Texas, and had been licensed to conduct and carry on its said business in the State of California by the insurance commissioner of said State, and that at the time of the granting of the said application so appointing the receiver aforesaid, respondent believed in good faith, and was of the opinion that the court over which he then presided, had jurisdiction to make said order, and that the facts set forth in said bill of complaint justified the court in making said order.

Respondent further alleges that thereafter, on the 6th day of August 1930 the defendant in said action, by its attorneys before mentioned, filed an answer therein wherein and whereby the defendant not only admitted each and all of the allegations contained in the said bill of complaint but joined in the petition for the appointment of said receiver and prayed that such decree be made in the premises as was just and proper and for the full protection of the plaintiff, the defendant, and all of the creditors of the latter.

And respondent further alleges that in and by said answer no attack whatever was made upon the jurisdiction of the court so presided over by respondent, to entertain the bill of complaint of the plaintiff therein, or to grant in such action such relief as might be just and proper.

Respondent further alleges that at no time down to the rendering of the decision by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals referred to in said article II, did he entertain any doubt of the jurisdiction of the court over which he presided to proceed with and pass upon the various and sundry matters arising in said action, and denies that in so proceeding he was guilty of a course of improper and/or unlawful conduct.

Respondent alleges that on the 1st day of December 1930 he made and there was thereafter filed in the office of the clerk of said court an order fixing and allowing as compensation of said receiver and his said counsel the sum of $3,000 each for services by them respectively rendered covering the period from the 29th day of July 1930 to the 30th day of November 1930. That the said allowance was made upon a detailed statement of the services rendered by said receiver and said attorney, filed in the office of the clerk of said court, and upon the written stipulation of the said Reisner & Deming, the attorneys for said plaintiff, and of Bronson, Bronson & Slaven, the attorneys for said defendant, which said stipulation was filed in the office of the clerk of said court on the 1st day of December 1930. That in the said stipulation of said attorneys it is recited that "the compensation for the services of the receiver for the above period of time from July 29, 1930, to and including November 30, 1930, in the sum of $3,000 is a proper and reasonable sum for the services rendered, and that the compensation for the legal services of the attorney for the receiver for the above period of time in the sum of $3,000 is a proper and reasonable sum for the legal services rendered by such attorney."

Respondent further alleges that on or about the 23d day of April 1931, as such judge, he made a further order allowing to said receiver and to his said attorney the additional sum of $3,000 each as compensation for services rendered by them respectively covering the period from December 1, 1930, to and including the 31st day of March 1931. That said order was likewise based in part upon the written stipulation of said attorneys, stipulating to the reasonableness of said amount, and which said stipulation was also filed in the office of the clerk of said court.

Respondent further alleges that in the fourth and final account filed by said receiver in said matter, under the heading "Disbursements", and under date of April 23, 1931, appears the $3,000 so allowed to the said receiver on said date by said order, and the like amount so allowed to his said counsel.

Respondent further alleges that no objection whatever was ever made by any person interested in said action to the allowance of said amounts or any of them until the petition for an order of settlement of the fourth and final account of said receiver was filed. That after a hearing thereon the respondent, as judge of said court, on the 15th day of December 1931, made an order approving and settling said fourth and final account, which order was on the day following filed in the office of the clerk of said court, and in said order, among other things, it is provided as follows:

"It is now here further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that Samuel M. Shortridge, Jr., receiver of Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association, defendant herein, be, and he is hereby instructed and directed, within 30 days from the date of the signing and filing of this order, to deliver to the receiver appointed by the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco, to wit: E. Forrest Mitchell, State Insurance Commissioner of California, any and all moneys in bank or otherwise held in the possession and custody of said Samuel M. Shortridge, Jr., as receiver of said defendant, Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association, and also any and all other assets, properties, books, records, papers, documents, notes, and all other personal property now in the possession or custody of said Samuel M. Shortridge, Jr., as receiver of said defendant, Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association, upon his obtaining and receiving a proper receipt or receipts therefor and filing said receipt or receipts with the clerk of the above-entitled court; provided, however, that if within 30 days from the signing and filing of this order the attorney for E. Forrest Mitchell, State insurance commissioner of California and receiver appointed by the State court of California as above stated, shall appeal from this order, then the further execution and performance by said receiver of this order shall be stayed until the final action by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit on said appeal, or, until the other or further order of this court or of the circuit court of appeals."

Respondent alleges that at no time was any application made to modify said order and respondent further alleges that subsequent to the making thereof and upon further and more mature consideration he became convinced he had erred in including the proviso in the said order above quoted, and then and there concluded and determined to modify said order by eliminating and striking therefrom the said proviso, and then and there would have made an order so modifying the order settling said fourth account except for the fact that an appeal had been taken from the whole of said order. Accordingly, and for the purpose of preserving and protecting the rights of all parties interested therein, all parties interested in said proceeding, including Mr. Frank L. Guerena, the attorney for E. Forrest Mitchell, State insurance commissioner of California, at the request of respondent, entered into a stipulation, in effect, consenting to the modification of said order, by striking therefrom the said proviso, said stipulation being in the words and figures following, to wit:

"STIPULATION AND ORDER TURNING OVER ASSETS

"It is stipulated and agreed by and between all parties hereto that Samuel M. Shortridge, Jr., the receiver of the defendant, Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association, be, and he is, hereby authorized to turn over and deliver forthwith to E. Forrest Mitchell, insurance commissioner of the State of California, the receiver of the defendant, Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association, appointed by the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco, all moneys in bank, assets, books, notes, papers, and all other property now in the custody or possession or under the control of said Samuel M. Shortridge, Jr., receiver appointed by this court of the defendant, Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association, upon obtaining proper receipts therefor; and it is further stipulated and agreed that that portion of the order approving fourth and final and supplemental accounts of receiver, denying petition for preferred claims, directing receiver to comply with order of United States Circuit Court of Appeals and thereupon discharging receiver and exonerating his bond, made and entered December 15, 1931, which provides that if an appeal be taken by said E. Forrest Mitchell, State insurance commissioner of California and receiver appointed by the State court of California, then the further execution and performance by said Samuel M. Shortridge, Jr., as receiver aforesaid, of the directions contained in said order shall be stayed until the final action by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit on said appeal or until the other or further order of the above-entitled court or the circuit court of appeals be, and the same is hereby, set aside and vacated. This stipulation is made without prejudice to the rights of any party hereto with respect to the appeal herein pending."

Respondent further alleges that thereupon, on the 11th day of January 1932, he made an order so modifying the said order so settling the said final account, in accordance with the terms and provisions of said stipulation and caused said order to be filed in the office of the clerk of said court on said 11th day of January 1932.

Respondent further alleges that on the 11th day of January 1932, when said order was so modified by him as aforesaid, the record of the appeal from the making of said order had not been prepared and that the said insurance commissioner of the State of California was not put to any delay, labor, or expense in protecting the rights of any person or persons by reason of the said order so settling the said fourth account having contained therein the proviso hereinabove quoted in full, and that the further prosecution of said appeal was directed solely and entirely to the question as to whether or not the amounts so awarded as aforesaid to said receiver and his said counsel as compensation for services rendered by them and the expenses incurred in connection therewith were reasonable or unreasonable.

Respondent denies that said order so settling the said fourth and final account of said receiver was made by him as a judge of said court to favor and enrich, or to favor or enrich any friend, political or otherwise, and denies that said order was made to the detriment and/or loss of any litigant or litigants in his said court and/or for the purpose or with the intention of forcing or causing said State commissioner of insurance and/or any party in interest in the said action unnecessary delay, labor, and/or expense in protecting the rights of all or any parties against said order.

Denies that this respondent did improperly and/or unlawfully or at all seek to coerce said State commissioner of insurance, and/or any party or parties in interest in said action to accept and/or acquiesce in any fees or disbursements granted by him to the said receiver or his said attorney.

Respondent alleges at the times of the making of the respective orders as hereinbefore stated, allowing compensation to said receiver and said attorney, he honestly and conscientiously believed the services rendered by them, and each of them, as shown by the detailed statements on file of the services rendered by them were reasonable and proper, and in so making said allowances, and each thereof, respondent was guided and influenced by the stipulation of the parties hereinbefore referred to.

Respondent denies that he ever improperly and/or unlawfully forced and coerced, or forced or coerced any of the parties to said proceeding to enter into the stipulation in said article II mentioned, but alleges that the making of said stipulation was brought about and made under the circumstances heretofore fully set forth and not otherwise.

Respondent denies that he did not give his fair, impartial, and/or judicial consideration to the objections of the said State commissioner of insurance against the fees allowed to the said receiver and his attorney, respectively, in the litigation referred to in said article II, and denies that in the making of said orders, or either thereof, he had any intention or purpose of favoring or enriching said receiver and his said attorney, or any friend or friends, at the expense of any person interested in said matter, or otherwise or at all.

Respondent alleges that any error made or committed by him in the making of said orders, or either thereof, was not made or brought about as the result of friendship or prejudice, and was made by him in good faith and without any thought, purpose, or desire on his part of being partial, oppressive, excessive, or unreasonable.

Respondent denies that he was and/or is guilty of a course of conduct oppressive and/or unjudicial, and/or of misbehavior in office as such judge, and was and/or is guilty of a misdemeanor in office by reason of any matter or thing set forth in said article II.

And except as hereinbefore specifically admitted or explained, respondent denies each and every allegation in said article II contained.

ANSWER TO ARTICLE III

For answer to the third article the respondent says that this honorable court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the third of said articles of impeachment so exhibited and presented against him, because, he says, the facts set forth in said third article do not, if true, constitute an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor as defined in the Constitution of the United States, and that, therefore, the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, should not further entertain the charge contained in said third article.

And now, not waiving the foregoing plea to the jurisdiction of the honorable Senate of the United States, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, as to said third article, said respondent saving to himself all advantages of exception to said third article, for answer thereto saith:

Further answering said article, the respondent admits, denies, and alleges, as follows:

I

Admits that on the 17th day of February 1932 by an order duly made and entered in that certain action then pending in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, in which action Waukesha Motor Co. was complainant and Fageol Motors Co., a corporation, and others were defendants, he appointed Guy H. Gilbert as receiver of the said Fageol Motors Co. and respondent alleges the facts and circumstances surrounding and leading up to the appointment of said receiver were as follows, and not otherwise:

On the 17th day of February 1932 a verified bill of complaint was filed in the office of the clerk of said court in the action above mentioned. That in said complaint, among other things, the appointment of a receiver was prayed for. That in said action Weinmann & Licking were the attorneys for the plaintiff and Bronson, Bronson & Slaven were the attorneys for defendants. Upon the filing of said bill of complaint, application was made to this respondent for the appointment of a receiver. Upon the filing of the complaint an answer was also filed admitting all the allegations of the complaint and therein stating that the defendant's consent to the relief prayed for. Said answer concludes as follows: "Wherefore the defendants pray that the relief prayed for in the bill of complaint be granted."

The said complaint, the said answer, and an order appointing receiver, with the name of the receiver left blank, was left with respondent's secretary in chambers by counsel for the respective parties during respondent's absence in court, with a request then and there made to said secretary for the appointment of a receiver, and a suggestion for the appointment of a person named by them whose name at the present time respondent cannot recollect. Knowing nothing personally of the person so suggested, respondent granted said application, but appointed one G. H. Gilbert receiver, filling in the blank space in the order so left with the respondent's secretary the name of G. H. Gilbert, who, according to respondent's information and belief, is the same person referred to in said article III as Guy H. Gilbert.

That said order as so prepared by counsel above referred to contained the following clause:

"Decreed that the receiver be, and hereby is, directed within thirty (30) days from the date of this decree, to cause to be mailed to each and every creditor of the defendants known to such receiver, a copy of this order and a notice of a motion to make the receivership herein permanent, such mailing to be in a securely sealed envelope, postage prepaid, and to be addressed to said creditor at the last post-office address known to the said receiver and such service by mail is hereby decreed to be due, timely, sufficient, and complete service of notice of this decree and this suit and of such notice and all proceedings had or to be had herein and upon all such creditors for all purposes."

Respondent alleges, upon and according to his information and belief, within 30 days after making of said order, to wit, on or about the 22d day of March 1932, said receiver, G. H. Gilbert, mailed to each creditor of said Fageol Motors Co., at the address given and as the name of said creditor appeared on the books of said Fageol Motors Co., a copy of said order so appointing said receiver, and a notice to the effect that on the 17th day of March 1932 said receiver would move the said court, so presided over by respondent, for an order making his appointment as temporary receiver, permanent. In addition thereto, said receiver caused to be served, on the 29th day of February 1932, a like notice upon the attorneys for the complainant and also upon the attorneys for the defendants, as shown by their written admissions of service on the back of said notice, and which said notice was filed in the office of the clerk of said court on the 1st day of March 1932. Respondent further alleges that at the time so fixed for the hearing of said motion the same was continued from the 17th day of March 1932 to the 21st day of March 1932, at which time said motion came on regularly for hearing. No opposition was made at said time by anyone to the making of the order requested, and thereupon respondent, as such judge, on said 21st day of March 1932 granted said motion and appointed the said G. H. Gilbert permanent receiver of said Fageol Motors Co., which said order reduced to writing and signed by respondent as judge of said court was filed in the office of the clerk of said court on the following day.

Respondent further alleges that no objection was ever made to him at any time to the appointment of the said G. H. Gilbert, either as temporary or permanent receiver.

Respondent denies that at the time of the appointment of said G. H. Gilbert as either temporary receiver or permanent receiver, he knew the said G. H. Gilbert to be incompetent, unfit and/or inexperienced for his duties as such, and respondent denies that said Gilbert was incompetent or unfit and/or inexperienced for the duties of said office.

Respondent denies that he oppressively and/or in disregard of the rights and interests of litigants, or any litigant in his court, did appoint the said G. H. Gilbert as receiver for the said Fageol Motors Co.

Respondent denies that he ever refused to grant a hearing to the plaintiff, the defendant, or any creditors or creditor, or any party or parties in interest in the matter of the said Fageol Motors Co. of the appointment of said receiver and denies that anyone connected with said litigation ever requested him to grant to said plaintiff or defendant, or any creditor or creditors, or anyone interested in said proceedings, a hearing.

Respondent denies that he caused the said litigants, parties in interest in said matter, or any of them, to be misinformed of his action in regard to the appointment of said G. H. Gilbert as such receiver, either while said Gilbert took the steps necessary to qualify as such receiver or in any other manner or at all, and respondent denies that thereby, or otherwise or at all he deprived said litigants and parties in interest, or any of them, of presenting the facts, circumstances, and conditions, or any of them, of said equity receivership, or the nature of the business and the type of the person necessary to operate the same in order to protect creditors, litigants, and all parties in interest or any of them, and thereby or otherwise or at all deprived the said parties in interest, or any of them, of an opportunity of protesting against the appointment of the said G. H. Gilbert, either as temporary or permanent receiver.

Respondent denies that in any matter or thing set forth or referred to in said article III he was guilty of misdemeanor in office resulting in expense, disadvantage, annoyance, and/or hindrance to litigants or any litigant in his court in the case in said article referred to, and further denies that he was and/or is guilty of a course of conduct constituting misbehavior as said judge and/or that he was guilty, or is guilty of a misdemeanor in office.

And except as hereinbefore specifically admitted, or explained, respondent denies each and every allegation in said article III contained.

ANSWER TO ARTICLE IV

For answer to the fourth article the respondent says that this honorable court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the fourth of said articles of impeachment so exhibited and presented against him, because, he says, the facts set forth in said fourth article do not, if true, constitute an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor as defined in the Constitution of the United States, and that, therefore, the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, should not further entertain the charge contained in said fourth article.

And now, not waiving the foregoing plea to the jurisdiction of the honorable Senate of the United States, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, as to said fourth article, said respondent saving to himself all advantages of exception to said fourth article, for answer thereto saith:

Further answering said article, the respondent admits, denies, and alleges, as follows:

I

Admits that on or about the 15th day of August 1931, by an order duly filed and entered in that certain action then pending in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, in which action Character Finance Co. of Santa Monico, a California corporation, was plaintiff, and Credential Holding Co. of Los Angeles, a Nevada corporation, was defendant, he appointed G. H. Gilbert as receiver of said defendant, and thereafter on the 18th day of August 1931, ratified and approved the appointment of Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel as attorneys for said receiver.

Respondent alleges that the facts and circumstances surrounding and leading up to the appointment of said receiver were as follows, and not otherwise:

On said 15th day of August 1931 a bill of complaint was filed in the office of the clerk of said court in the action last above referred to. That in said bill of complaint, among other things, the appointment of a receiver was prayed.

That in said action Gold, Quittner & Kearsley were attorneys for the plaintiff. Upon the filing of the said bill of complaint an application was made to this respondent for the appointment of a receiver. At the making of said application the plaintiff was represented by Brice Kearsley, Jr., of the said firm of Gold, Quittner & Kearsley, and the said defendant corporation was represented by its director and vice president, J. H. Stephens, who joined in the request of said attorney for plaintiff for the making of the order appointing a receiver. Thereupon respondent, as judge of said court, made the order so appointing the said G. H. Gilbert receiver as aforesaid.

That in said bill of complaint, among other things, it was alleged that the plaintiff corporation was organized under the laws of the State of California, with its principal place of business in the county of Los Angeles in that State, and was a citizen and resident of said State; it was further alleged that the defendant therein was incorporated under the laws of the State of Nevada, was a citizen and resident thereof, and having its principal place of business in the city of Oakland in the State aforesaid. That the said city of Los Angeles was and is within the jurisdiction of the District Court for the Southern Division of California. It was further alleged that the grounds upon which the jurisdiction depended were diversity of citizenship and the fact that the corporate defendant had property within the jurisdiction of the court, so presided over by your respondent. Said complaint further alleged the amount involved was in excess of $3,000; that the plaintiff was the owner of 6,400 shares of class B preferred stock and 3,200 shares of common stock, all issued by defendant, and plaintiff had acquired this stock under an agreement entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant on the 12th day of September 1929 wherein and whereby it was agreed between said parties that plaintiff should transfer to defendant all its assets, alleged to be of the value of $96,000, in consideration of the defendant issuing to plaintiff the stock aforesaid and assuming and promising to pay certain outstanding indebtedness of plaintiff in the sum of $15,000. The complaint further alleged, in conformity with said agreement, the plaintiff had transferred all of its said assets to defendant, that defendant had issued said stock to plaintiff, had paid said indebtedness to the extent of $10,000, but refused and had failed and neglected to pay the balance thereof.

Said complaint further alleged the defendant was engaged in the business of buying, selling, and dealing in real property, both improved and unimproved, and of conducting numerous and divers finance and mortgage companies and thrift banks. It was further alleged that defendant's assets were of the fair, reasonable value of approximately $1,150,000, and that defendant's indebtedness to various creditors aggregated approximately the sum of $1,100,000. It was further alleged that on many of its real-estate holdings there existed liens in the form of mortgages or deeds of trust; that sales had already been made under certain of said mortgages or deeds of trust, due to mismanagement of the directors of defendant, and that further sales under other mortgages and deeds of trust were about to be had. It was further alleged that attachments had been levied against the property of the defendant in a suit brought to recover the sum of $60,000 by the First National Bank of Bakersfield in said State of California; that other attachment suits were threatened; that the defendant had neglected to pay and had permitted to become delinquent taxes on various of its properties and holdings and that the president of said company had improperly and without authority transferred certain of its assets consisting of accounts receivable to various parties for collection and adjustment and that various creditors of the said defendant were pressing their claims for payment and that defendant was without sufficient funds to meet its obligations, the majority of which were past due. It was further alleged in said complaint, in order to prevent a multiplicity of suits—the obtaining of preferences—and to obtain an equitable winding up of the business of said defendant and a just application of its assets amongst its creditors and its stockholders, and also for the prevention of irreparable injury and damage that would result to such creditors and the stockholders of defendant, the appointment of a receiver was advisable and necessary.

Respondent admits that on the 20th day of August 1931 a motion to dismiss the said action was filed on behalf of said defendant, appearing specially for the making of said motion upon the grounds that said bill of complaint was not properly verified and that plaintiff was a resident of the southern district of the State of California and the defendant a resident of the State of Nevada.

Respondent further admits that on the 29th day of August 1931 said motion to dismiss came on to be heard, and at which time plaintiff was granted permission to file a memorandum of authorities. Said motion to dismiss was finally submitted on the 19th day of September 1931 and granted by respondent, as judge of said court, on the 2d day of October 1931.

Respondent further admits that during the pendency of the said motion to dismiss and on the 5th day of September 1931 a petition in bankruptcy was filed against the said Prudential Holding Co., and in which latter proceeding on the 30th day of September 1931 as judge of said court, he made an order therein appointing the said G. H. Gilbert receiver in said bankruptcy proceeding, and thereafter approved the appointment of said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel and others, as attorneys for said receiver in bankruptcy.

Respondent denies that he willfully, improperly, and/or unlawfully took jurisdiction of the said cause in bankruptcy, and denies that he made the order so appointing the said receiver in said bankruptcy proceeding, while sitting in a part of said court to which he had not been assigned at said time. In this behalf respondent alleges that said bankruptcy proceeding had been assigned to the department presided over by the Honorable A. F. St. Sure, one of the duly appointed, qualified, and acting judges of said court. That at the time of the filing of said bankruptcy proceedings Judge St. Sure was absent from the city and county of San Francisco, and respondent alleges that said judge had requested respondent to act for him in all such matters as might arise during his said absence, and for said reason and no other respondent acted for and on behalf of the said judge in the hearing of said application and the making of said order.

Respondent denies that the order made on the 15th day of August 1931 appointing the said G. H. Gilbert receiver in said equity proceeding was made without notice to the said Prudential Holding Co., and further admits that said order was made upon a complaint or petition verified not by plaintiff therein, but by one of the attorneys for plaintiff, and alleges that said verification recited that said attorney had been duly authorized by the plaintiff to verify and file the same.

Respondent denies that the said G. H. Gilbert was appointed such receiver or that respondent ratified the selection by said receiver of Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel as his attorneys in an attempt, or in any attempt on the part of respondent to benefit and/or enrich the said receiver and/or his said attorneys, or any of them.

Respondent denies that in the appointment of the said G. H. Gilbert, as receiver, or in the ratification of the said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel, as attorneys for said receiver, said respondent failed to give his fair, impartial, and/or judicial consideration to the application of the said Prudential Holding Co. for a dismissal of said complaint or petition and/or a discharge of said receiver.

And respondent denies that said alleged failure to give such consideration to said application or petition was in an attempt to benefit and enrich or benefit or enrich the said receiver and his said attorneys, or any of them.

And respondent denies that said Prudential Holding Co. was at any time prior to the filing of said notice of motion to dismiss, entitled in law to have said receiver discharged.

Respondent denies that in any matter or thing referred to in said article IV he acted oppressively or deliberately or willfully, or that he misused the powers of his judicial office with the sole purpose, or for any purpose, of benefiting and enriching, or benefiting or enriching, the said receiver and his said attorneys, or any of them.

Respondent denies that he caused the said Prudential Holding Co. to be put to unnecessary delay, expense, and/or labor, or deprived it of a fair, impartial, and/or judicial consideration of its right or rights and/or the protection of its property.

Respondent denies that in any matter or thing set forth or referred to in said article IV he was guilty of misbehavior in office or filled with partiality and/or favoritism, or made any order whatever referred to in said article for the sole or any purpose of benefiting and enriching or benefiting or enriching any personal friend or friends, or associate or associates.

Respondent further alleges that in said receivership in said equity proceeding no fees whatever were allowed or received by either said receiver or his said attorneys and in said bankruptcy proceeding no fees whatever were allowed by respondent, as judge of said court, to either said receiver or to any of his said attorneys.

And, except as hereinbefore specifically admitted, respondent denies each and every allegation in said article IV contained.

ANSWER TO ARTICLE V

For answer to the fifth article the respondent says that this honorable Court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the fifth of said articles of impeachment so exhibited and presented against him, because, he says, the facts set forth in said fifth article do not, if true, constitute an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor as defined in the Constitution of the United States, and that therefore the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, should not further entertain the charge contained in said fifth article.

And now, not waiving the foregoing plea to the jurisdiction of the honorable Senate of the United States, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, as to said fifth article, said respondent, saving to himself all advantages of exception to said fifth article, for answer thereto saith:

I

That said article V is so uncertain and indefinite as to time, place, and proceedings that respondent cannot ascertain therefrom with reasonable, or any, certainty, in what proceeding or proceedings, or at what time or times, or at what place or places, his conduct was, as set forth in said article V, and respondent cannot safely proceed to trial as to said fifth article before this honorable Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, at a distance of more than 3,000 miles from where respondent has presided as such judge, as aforesaid, without being apprised in advance in the particulars aforesaid, in order to procure the attendance of such witnesses as may be necessary to meet such charge or charges.

Wherefore respondent, upon the reading and filing of this answer will move the honorable Senate of the United States, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, to require the honorable House of Representatives of the United States, within a reasonable time, to be by it specified, to make said fifth article more definite and certain in the particulars aforesaid, and failing so to do, this honorable body dismiss said article V.

And without waiving but expressly reserving his right to make said motion and to have the same passed upon by the honorable Senate of the United States, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, respondent, answering said article V, admits and denies as follows, to wit:

I

Respondent admits that on the 17th day of April 1928 he was duly appointed United States district judge for the northern district of California, and has held such office to the present day.

II

Denies that at any time or times, or at any place or places, during his term of office, when acting as such judge, he conducted himself in his said court in his capacity as judge in the making of any decision or decisions, or order or orders in any action or actions pending in his court, and before him as such judge, so as to excite fear and/or distrust, and/or to inspire a wide-spread, or any belief, in and/or beyond said northern district of California, that any cause was or that any causes were not decided in said court according to their merits, but was or were decided with partiality and/or with prejudice and/or favoritism to certain or any individuals or individual, particularly, or at all, to receivers and attorneys for receivers by him appointed, or any of them.

III

Respondent denies that at any time in any matter referred to in said article V he displayed a high degree of indifference or any indifference to the litigants or any litigant in equity receiverships, or in any other proceedings, as to excite fear and distrust, or fear or distrust, and/or to inspire a wide-spread belief, or any belief in and/or beyond said northern district of California that any cause or causes were not decided in said court according to their merits but were decided with partiality and/or with prejudice and/or favoritism to certain or any individual or individuals, particularly, or otherwise, or at all, as to receivers and attorneys for receivers, or any of them by him so appointed.

IV

Respondent denies that at any time referred to in article V, or at any other time, he so conducted himself in said office and in his capacity as judge as aforesaid as to cause or bring about any scandal and/or disrepute of said court and/or the administration of justice therein, and further denies that any conduct on his part whether referred to in said article V or otherwise, ever was or has been or is prejudicial to the dignity of the judiciary.

V

Respondent further denies that he ever was or now is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and/or of a misdemeanor in office.

Except as hereinbefore specifically admitted, respondent denies each and every allegation in said article V contained.

And this respondent in submitting to this honorable court this his answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, respectfully insists that he is not guilty of any of the charges contained in any of the said 5 articles of impeachment, and respectfully reserves leave to amend and add to this his said answer from time to time as may become necessary or proper and when said necessity and propriety shall appear.

Dated April 11, 1933.

HAROLD LOUDERBACK,
Respondent.
WALTER H. LINFORTH,
JAMES M. HANLEY,
Of Counsel for Respondent.

During the reading of the respondent's answer,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that several Senators are present who have not as yet taken the oath as members of the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment. They will present themselves at the desk and now take the oath.

Thereupon the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] advanced to the desk, and the oath was administered to them by the Vice President.

After the reading of the respondent's answer,

Mr. LINFORTH. Mr. President, in obedience to the provisions of the answer just read, and insofar as the fifth count thereof is concerned, the respondent, Harold Louderback, at this time presents a written notice of motion to make the fifth article in the articles of impeachment more definite and certain in the particulars specified in his answer, and we ask that such notice of motion be read and filed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. HAROLD LOUDERBACK—MOTION TO MAKE ARTICLE V OF THE ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT MORE DEFINITE AND CERTAIN

The respondent, Harold Louderback, moves the honorable Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment, for an order requiring the honorable House of Representatives of the United States, within a reasonable specified time, to make more definite and certain the charges contained in article V of the articles of impeachment herein in the following particular or particulars, that is to say:

To specify the time and times, and the place or places, and the name or title of the proceeding or proceedings, and the circumstance or circumstances wherein in said fifth article it is claimed the said respondent was guilty of the conduct referred to and set forth therein.

Said motion is made for the reason and on the ground that it is impossible for respondent to be prepared to meet said charges and to summon witnesses in regard thereto without first being advised of the time and times, and the place and places, and the name or title of the proceeding or proceedings, and the circumstance or circumstances wherein in said fifth article it is claimed the said respondent was guilty of the conduct referred to and set forth therein.

And, in the event of the failure of said House of Representatives within the time so fixed to amend said fifth article in the particulars aforesaid, that this honorable body dismiss the charges contained in said fifth article.

Dated April 11, 1933.

WALTER H. LINFORTH,
JAMES M. HANLEY,
Counsel for Said Respondent.

Mr. LINFORTH. Mr. President, in obedience to the notice, we now, on behalf of the respondent, move this honorable Senate to require the House to specify, in the particulars set forth, the fifth count of the articles, and, failing so to do within a reasonable time, that that article be dismissed. We are ready at any time that will suit the convenience of the Senate or the managers on the part of the House to present the motion.

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House, in order to comply with the suggestion of counsel for the respondent and to save the necessity of considering the motion, consent to attempt to make article 5 more specific and to procure the endorsement of the House of Representatives. It is understood that we cannot of ourselves do these things. They have to be done through the House, but we will undertake to do the best we can.

Mr. LINFORTH. Mr. President, may a time be specified within which that will be done, so that we will be apprised about when the pleadings will be settled in this matter, in order that we may be able to prepare for trial?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, unless the honorable managers, or the honorable attorneys for the respondent, have something further to offer, the Committee on the Judiciary have a number of formal orders they desire to present.

I send an order to the desk and ask for its adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona offers an order, which the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the managers on the part of the House be allowed until the 15th day of May 1933, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, to present a replication, or other pleading, of the House of Representatives to the answer of the respondent. That any subsequent pleadings, either on the part of the managers or of the respondent, shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate, of which notice shall be given to the House of Representatives and the respondent, respectively, so that all pleadings shall be closed on or before the 15th day of May 1933, and that the trial shall proceed on the said 15th day of May 1933 at 1 o'clock p.m.

Mr. LINFORTH. Mr. President, in the consideration of such a motion, it seems to the respondent that the pleadings in this matter should be settled in advance of the trial of the case. As the president and the managers know, these proceedings complained of have their origin in the State of California, more than 3,000 miles from the meeting place of this honorable Senate. In order properly to prepare, and present witnesses, we ought, as it seems to us, have the pleadings settled, so that the issues will be defined at least a reasonable time in advance of the time of trial.

I should like to suggest, if the managers prior to the time suggested can present such replication as they may see fit, after we have been permitted to answer the amendment to the fifth count, that that be done before the day fixed for trial.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senate, of course, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, is the judge not only of the law but of the evidence and the pleadings. The order I have sent to the desk is in strict accord with orders in previous cases, notably, the Archbald case, and particularly the Swayne case, they being in point of time the two nearest cases the Senate has tried.

With all due deference to the suggestion of the honorable attorneys, I suggest to them that the order is in accordance with precedent, but, of course, the managers should be heard, if they wish to make any statement with respect to the subject.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be excused from sitting as a member of this court, and to be relieved of the obligation of the oath I have taken. My reason is that I was a member of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House when this matter was presented to that committee, and I was a Member of the House of Representatives at the time the articles of impeachment were voted. Therefore I do not believe I would be a proper juror in this case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to excusing the Senator from Illinois from acting in the case? The Chair hears none, and the Senator is excused.

Do the managers on the part of the House desire to make any statement in reference to the matter presented by the attorneys on behalf of the respondent?

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. Mr. President, of course—as the honorable Senator from Arizona, the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, has stated—this matter is entirely within the control of the Senate. On the part of the managers, I may say to counsel for the respondent, and to the Members of the Senate, that we will be as expeditious as we possibly can be toward the completion of the pleadings on the part of the managers, and will furnish to counsel for the respondent, just as soon as they are completed, copies of everything prepared on the part of the managers of the House.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Arizona, I may say that in both the Archbald case and the Swayne case 3 days were given for the filing of the replication. The Senator's motion is that the managers be given until the 15th day of May. We do not know the issues that will be framed. Our witnesses cannot meet those issues. Therefore I say to the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, that before a definite day is set for trial we ought to have the pleadings in the case perfected.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senate, to the honorable managers, and to the honorable attorneys, would it suffice to require the honorable managers to file their pleadings on or by the 10th of May, and that the pleadings or answers on the part of the respondent be filed by the 15th, and trial commence on the 15th?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, that is not fair. There is no reason why, if they have a replication to file, it cannot be filed in 10 or 15 days. What is the reason why they cannot file it in 10 or 15 days? There does not seem to be any reason. The attorneys ought to have a month to prepare for that kind of a thing. I know something about impeachments. I have been in one.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BRATTON. Under the rules governing impeachment trials Senators are not permitted to engage in colloquies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I suggest that the honorable managers file all their pleadings and their replication by the 10th of May, and that the respondent be given to the 15th of May to file his rejoinder or other pleadings, and that the trial begin at 1 o'clock in the afternoon on the 15th day of May.

Mr. LINFORTH. Mr. President, may I respectfully ask that the suggestion be amended so as to provide that the replication be filed not later than the 1st of May? The replication as a rule consists of a few lines, and if filed by the 1st of May it will give the managers of the House at least 3 weeks.

Mr. ASHURST. That is satisfactory, the 1st of May.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request that the date be changed to the 1st of May? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to send an order to the desk, and move its adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama presents an order, which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the answer of the respondent, Harold Louderback, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives be printed for the use of the Senate sitting in the trial of said impeachment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order is agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I rightly understand the situation, after the replication shall be filed, on the 1st of May, the proceedings will go forward on the 15th. So, acting upon that assumption, I send the following order to the desk and ask that it be read for the benefit of the court.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the order.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That lists of witnesses be furnished to the Sergeant at Arms by the managers and by the respondent, and said witnesses shall be subpenaed to appear on Monday, the 15th day of May 1933, at 1 o'clock p.m.

Mr. LINFORTH. Mr. President, inasmuch as issue will not be joined until May 1, and not knowing what the issues will be until that time, we ask that it be not required that the list of witnesses be furnished prior to that date.

Mr. LONG. A point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LONG. As I understand, they are to file their rejoinder, or replication, or other pleading, by the 1st of May. Does this order mean that the witnesses are to be summoned to appear on the 1st of May?

Mr. ASHURST. The 15th.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the order calls for the issuing of subpenas and the returns so that the witnesses may be in attendance on the 15th of May, the date when it is assumed the trial will proceed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No date is specified when the witnesses shall be summoned, but they are to be here on the 15th of May, as the Chair understands.

Is there objection to the order proposed by the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I send to the desk the following order, and move its adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the order.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That in addition to the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials, heretofore adopted, and supplementary to such rules, the following rules shall be applicable in the trial of the impeachment of Harold Louderback, United States judge for the northern district of California:

1. In all matters relating to the procedure of the Senate, whether as to form or otherwise, the managers on the part of the House or the counsel representing the respondent may submit a request or application orally to the Presiding Officer, or, if required by him or requested by any Senator, shall submit the same in writing.

2. In all matters relating immediately to the trial, such as the admission, rejection, or striking out of evidence, or other questions usually arising in the trial of causes in courts of justice, if the managers on the part of the House or counsel representing the respondent desire to make any application, request, or objection, the same shall be addressed directly to the Presiding Officer and not otherwise.

3. It shall not be in order for any Senator, except as provided in the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials, to engage in colloquy or to address questions either to the managers on the part of the House or to counsel for the respondent, nor shall it be in order for Senators to address each other; but they shall address their remarks directly to the Presiding Officer and not otherwise.

4. The parties may, by stipulation in writing filed with the Secretary of the Senate and by him laid before the Senate or presented at the trial, agree upon any facts involved in the trial; and such stipulation shall be received by the Senate for all intents and purposes as though the facts therein agreed upon had been established by legal evidence adduced at the trial.

5. The parties or their counsel may interpose objection to witnesses answering questions propounded at the request of any Senator, and the merits of any such objection may be argued by the parties or their counsel; and the Presiding Officer may rule on any such objection, which ruling shall stand as the judgment of the Senate, unless some Member of the Senate shall ask that a formal vote be taken thereon, in which case it shall be submitted to the Senate for decision; or he may, at his option, in the first instance submit any such question to a vote of the Members of the Senate. Upon all such questions the vote shall be without debate and without a division, unless the ayes and nays be demanded by one fifth of the Members present, when the same shall be taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order is entered. The Chair hears none.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, having entered an order that the trial shall begin on Monday, May 15, and in view of the fact that there appear to be some points in the pleadings upon which it may become necessary to pass, I suggest that when the Senate, sitting as such court, takes a recess it recess until Monday, May 1, at 12:30 o'clock p.m. Meanwhile I offer the following order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona offers an order, which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate to the House of Representatives an attested copy of the answer of Harold Louderback, judge of the United States district court in and for the northern district of California, to the articles of impeachment, and also a copy of the foregoing order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order is entered.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, unless the honorable managers on the part of the House or the honorable attorneys for the respondent have something to communicate to the court, I move that the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, take a recess until Monday, May 1, at 12:30 o'clock p.m.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. President, may I suggest to the President, to the Senator from Arizona, and to the other Senators that we ought to have something done with the motion to make the fifth article more definite and certain, and that the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, ought to adjourn for 4 or 5 days in order to give the House, through its managers, an opportunity to make the article more definite, so that when we go home we will know who our witnesses will be and we will be able to prepare our defense. As article V is now drawn, we are at sea to know how to meet it; we are compelled to defend every official act of Judge Louderback during a period of 5 years. It would require that some two or three hundred witnesses be summoned from California to the Senate in order to defend his conduct unless we knew, with a reasonable certainty, what the article embraces. Therefore I suggest that an adjournment of 4 days might be taken for that particular purpose.

Mr. ASHURST. I can only speak for myself as an individual Senator. I am quite certain that the honorable managers will comply with the request and demand of the honorable attorneys for the respondent and will make their pleadings definite and certain; indeed, I believe they will serve within 5 days on the honorable attorneys the proper papers looking toward making the pleadings more definite and certain. I will ask the opinion of the managers on the part of the House as to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Do the managers on the part of the House desire to make a statement concerning the suggestion of counsel for the respondent?

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House contemplate beginning work immediately on article V in order to comply with the suggestion made by counsel for the respondent. We understand, however, that there is a possibility that the House and the Senate may adjourn for a few days very soon, perhaps over Easter—I am not certain about that—but we could be ready in 3 or 4 days if we could find the House and Senate in session so that we could make a return.

May I make the suggestion, if I may be pardoned for doing it, that as soon as the specification with regard to article V is completed, we will be very glad, as I said before, to furnish a copy to counsel for the respondent. I do not know whether or not counsel for the respondent want to remain in the city until we shall have completed complying with their request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the managers on the part of the House have to go back to the House and obtain authority to amend article V and that there may be some question as to the House being in session during the latter part of the present week. Is that correct?

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. That is the difficulty we confront.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair calls that circumstance to the attention of the counsel for the respondent.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. President and Members of the Senate——

Mr. Manager SUMNERS rose.

Mr. HANLEY. Excuse me; I will yield to the manager on the part of the House.

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. We feel, Mr. President, that we may say, with reasonable assurance of ability to comply, that we will be prepared by Tuesday of next week.

Mr. LINFORTH. Make it Monday.

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. We are afraid the House may not be in session on Monday.

Mr. LINFORTH. Then not later than Tuesday.

Mr. HANLEY. I suggest, Mr. President, that the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, adjourn to an early date, because if article V, as amended, is not as definite and certain as we want to make it we ought to be given an opportunity again to present the case to the Senate and state wherein the particulars have not been specified. Therefore the session of the Court of Impeachment ought to go over until some time when we can see that particular amended article V, so that we may know where we stand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has the Senator from Arizona any suggestion as to the date to which the recess of the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, should be taken?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if counsel for the respondents feel that they cannot adequately prepare or meet the issues or that pleadings ought to be more definite and certain, certainly, in the interest of fairness and judicial procedure, I have no objection to the court adjourning until next Tuesday, April 18, at 12:30 o'clock, at which time the pleadings may be settled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator move that the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, take a recess until that hour on Tuesday.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask the honorable counsel for the respondents if that will be satisfactory to them?

Mr. LINFORTH. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. ASHURST. Then, I move, if it is also satisfactory to the managers on the part of the House, that the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, take a recess until 12:30 o'clock p.m., on Tuesday next, April 18.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 10 minutes p.m) the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, took a recess until Tuesday, April 18, 1933, at 12:30 o'clock p.m.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida had the floor at the time the impeachment proceedings began on the motion submitted by him, but, the unfinished business now being before the Senate, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is recognized.

6-HOUR DAY 5-DAY WEEK—MOTION TO RECONSIDER

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] has already begun his remarks on his motion to reconsider, I do not know of any reason why that motion cannot be disposed of in a short time. I have discussed the matter with the Senator from Florida, and, while he desires to continue his remarks, I understand that they will be completed within a reasonable time, probably in 20 or 30 minutes, as I understood the Senator.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I said to the Senator, and I repeat, that, so far as I am concerned, I would probably not occupy over 20 or 30 minutes longer, and that I myself had no objection to a disposition of the motion by a unanimous-consent agreement. But, of course, as to that I cannot speak for anyone except myself.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, insofar as I am concerned, I might want to take 4 or 5 minutes, certainly no longer, and, since we have already begun on this matter, and it would require in order to bring it up another adjournment if it should not be proceeded with now, I should like to ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, in order that we may proceed with and conclude the consideration of the motion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama make a unanimous-consent request to the effect indicated by him?

Mr. BLACK. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before that is done, I wish to say a few words. I have already stated the urgent necessity for the passage of the pending bill. I appreciate that by having an adjournment until this morning we lost 2 hours today which might have been devoted to the pending bill, but the adjournment was taken in order to afford an opportunity to dispose of the motion of the Senator from Florida. Personally, I think that the motion ought to be disposed of, and, it now being 10 minutes after 2 o'clock, so far as I am concerned, as the Senator managing the pending farm bill, if the motion can be disposed of by 3 o'clock I am willing to accord that length of time, at the expiration of which time I shall be disposed to call for the regular order.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I am quite sure there are several Senators on this side of the aisle who will want to address themselves to the motion of the Senator from Florida. That being so, I shall have to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Senator from West Virginia if he objects to considering the motion now?

Mr. HATFIELD. Taking into consideration what the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has said, that he would object to considering the motion after the hour of 3 o'clock, I do not believe, Mr. President, that it can be disposed of within that time, and for that reason I made the objection. There are absent from the Chamber at the present time some Senators who are interested in the motion and who wish to discuss it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I regret very much that the Senator from West Virginia objects to making an effort to dispose of the motion. I cannot see why he should do that unless he desires to delay the measure. If he objects to making progress, it is an indication that he does not want progress made. The Senator from South Carolina did not object; the Senator from West Virginia is objecting.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I do not believe that my record here will justify the statement the Senator has just made, that it is my purpose at any time ever to delay any question that is before the Senate. I made a statement upon this bill when it was pending; and not only that, but I offered an amendment. That amendment, I think, is of paramount importance in connection with the adoption of the proposed law, and until the Senators who represent States that adjoin the Canadian border and who are absent at the present time are heard, I must object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I assume, then, that the Senator is not objecting for himself, but is objecting for someone else. I should like to ask the Senator, if a quorum is called and the other Senators do not object, whether the Senator himself will then repeat his objection.

Mr. HATFIELD. No; I have no objection to the consideration of the motion at this time, provided a quorum is called and there is no objection made upon the part of any other Senator who is interested in the motion.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Bailey	Black	Brown
Ashurst	Bankhead	Bone	Bulkley
Austin	Barbour	Borah	Bulow
Bachman	Barkley	Bratton	Byrd
Byrnes	George	McAdoo	Schall
Capper	Glass	McCarran	Russell
Caraway	Goldsborough	McGill	Sheppard
Carey	Gore	McKellar	Shipstead
Clark	Hale	McNary	Smith
Connally	Harrison	Metcalf	Steiwer
Coolidge	Hastings	Murphy	Stephens
Copeland	Hatfield	Neely	Thomas, Okla.
Costigan	Hayden	Norbeck	Thomas, Utah
Couzens	Johnson	Norris	Townsend
Cutting	Kean	Nye	Trammell
Dickinson	Kendrick	Overton	Tydings
Dieterich	Keyes	Patterson	Vandenberg
Dill	King	Pittman	Van Nuys
Duffy	La Follette	Pope	Wagner
Erickson	Lewis	Reed	Walcott
Fess	Logan	Reynolds	Walsh
Fletcher	Lonergan	Robinson, Ark.	Wheeler
Frazier	Long	Robinson, Ind.	White

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Ninety-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the unanimous-consent request submitted by the Senator from Alabama that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] be considered. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, after some investigation and inquiry in view of the importance of the subject, it is my opinion that it could not be disposed of by 3 o'clock, but would probably require the rest of the afternoon. I do not know how generous the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] cares to be.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have stated I would not consent to have the matter go beyond 3 o'clock. In view of what the Senator from Oregon states it would seem that it is idle to begin until such time as we may both begin and conclude the matter.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to state to the Senator that I have been unable to find anyone—and I have asked a great number of Senators—who desires to discuss the motion except the Senator from Florida himself. It may be I have not talked to the right Senators.

Mr. McNARY. My information is different and I think more accurate. There are some Senators representing States along the border who desire to be heard on the motion. There is no desire on the part of those on this side of the aisle to prolong the discussion. However, it is an important subject, and they want to be able to present it thoroughly. If the Senator from South Carolina is willing to give sufficient time for its consideration, I shall make no objection, but I could not consent and I will not consent at this time to the conclusion of the argument and a vote at 3 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in view of the statement made by the Senator from Oregon that, though the discussion went on, at the expiration of the time I have indicated we could not reach a vote, I think we might as well proceed with the regular order, because nothing would be accomplished except to hear some of those who care to discuss it and then no vote be reached.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business this afternoon it adjourn until tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in the absence of the able leader on the Democratic side, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who was just a moment ago called from the Chamber, I could not consent at this time to the unanimous consent proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. SMITH. That question can be brought up before we conclude our session this afternoon. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is demanded.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the pending amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] has offered the following amendment to the committee amendment which is pending: On page 12, line 2, after the word "commodity" and the period, insert the following:

In computing the current average farm price in the case of wheat, premiums paid producers for protein content shall not be taken into account.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this language is taken from the old allotment bill, H.R. 13991, which was passed by the House during the last session and was considered by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The provision is for the protection of the wheat growers who have the peculiar quality of wheat known as protein content, and are paid a premium over the market price. All the amendment would do would be to insure to the wheat grower who has that high quality of protein wheat, whether it be hard spring wheat or some variety of winter wheat that has that quality, that he would be paid the protein premium in advance of and over the regular market price of wheat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 13, line 14, strike out the word "act" and insert the word "title."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, recurring for the moment to the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] which was under discussion earlier in the afternoon, I desire to state that I received information on yesterday, not with reference to the Senator from Florida, who made the motion, nor with reference to any other Senator, that an effort is being made by the president of the National Manufacturers' Association and the National Chamber of Commerce to delay action upon the bill; that they desire in every way possible to cooperate to try to prevent action in this body.

It is my intention to seek to have the Senate adjourn today in order that the motion may be taken up tomorrow during the morning hour. I have no desire whatever to bring about any precipitate action in connection with the measure. The Senator from Florida has made a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, which he has a perfect right to have considered, and which I desire that he shall have considered. He has submitted the motion with the idea of presenting certain facts to this body and has partially proceeded along the line of his argument, ably presenting the viewpoint that he desires to bring to the attention of the Senate.

I know that the Senator from Florida has no desire to prevent action upon the measure; but I desire to state now that if there does develop tomorrow, in line with information which has come to me, the manifest intention to prevent action on the measure, while I do not ordinarily believe in making motions to table, yet I shall certainly give the Senate an opportunity to vote on such a motion tomorrow during the morning hour.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, in view of the statement made by the Senator from Alabama about what he has heard with regard to manufacturers' organizations, and so forth, I desire to say a word. I believe the Senator probably vindicated me in his statement. Personally, I have had no such experience. I have not heard anything of the kind from them.

At the time I made the motion, I think on Friday of last week, my inspiration for making it was that some people in my State engaged in the lumber business, and engaged in the phosphate business, and engaged in cigarmaking, and engaged in the production of tobacco wired me that under these restrictions, where American products produced by American labor were prohibited from entering into interstate-commerce territory unless it was established that the restrictions contained in the bill under discussion had been complied with, and with foreign-made products of the same character, made by labor working all kinds of hours for all kinds of wages, permitted to come in freely, they were very apprehensive that that would prove very detrimental to their industry and labor in such industry.

I have received, and I think my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] has received, some telegrams from the cigar industry. I have been at least going along with the idea of the 6-hour day and the 5-day week, because I have always been sympathetic with labor. I have always been their friend. I have helped them in many a battle—I dare say as many as my good friend from Alabama, and I think he has always been a good friend of labor. But it was upon that basis that I came over rather hurriedly to see if the measure had been sent to the House in order that I might enter this motion.

I never heard from any manufacturers' organization, or anybody of the kind. I care nothing about them. I always try to treat a manufacturer fairly, but he would have no undue influence at all with me on the question of hours or the question at issue in this bill. I dare say there have not been as many as half a dozen manufacturers who have written me on the subject. I will say that 6 to 8 at most, including our Florida people, have written me. In fact, I do not think I have received over three communications from outside the State of Florida. I merely wanted us to have an opportunity to consider again on its merits the question whether or not we were going to put inhibitions on the sale of products made entirely by American labor and manufactured by American manufacturers that would necessarily increase the cost of the production of those commodities, and if, on the other hand, we were going to allow foreign labor without any restrictions whatever to make their goods and bring them into this country and sell them in this interstate territory. I cannot help but believe that that is a course that is detrimental to our American labor; and as a friend of the American laboring men I therefore entered this motion.

Now, as to the other question, I have tried to get the motion considered today, and I called it up today; but I knew nothing of the impeachment proceedings coming up today. I thought we would have an hour and a quarter or more to devote to the motion when I called it up. I gladly agreed with the Senator, and so far as I am concerned I will agree now on a limitation of about an hour. I should be very glad if we could have the motion taken up and considered and disposed of within an hour's time, and I have no objection to such a plan, but favored it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have no interest at all in the 30-hour bill except to carry out the promise that our candidate made to the people, and that our party made to the people.

Our party promised the people of this country an immediate, substantial reduction in the working hours and working days. I do not know just what particular part the party has played in this bill since we have inaugurated our new administration; but as a member of the party, having been one of the members of the convention that adopted this platform, and having had some little, insignificant part in explaining the virtues of our candidate's promises and the promises of the platform, I was interested in seeing this legislation enacted into law.

I do not understand that the proponent of the bill that we now have under consideration expects much good to come from it whether we pass it or not. In other words, I have before me the few remarks made by the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] yesterday, and I read about seven of those lines. He said:

So far as the pending bill is concerned, I am going to let it take its course, hoping and praying that it may bring about the result which those who drafted it and are putting it through hoped it might, but if I do not believe it will, I am not going to subordinate my convictions to those of anybody else. I am not throwing monkey wrenches into the machinery, but I am not going to attempt to extol that which I do not think worthy of being extolled, or to advocate that which I do not believe will do the work which the poor farmers need to have done. No; I will not.

From reading this statement by the distinguished Senator, whose convictions are never subordinated to the circumstances of the time or the will-o'-the-wisp of politics, I am constrained to believe that the Senator from South Carolina does not think much of the bill that we have up before the Senate at this time. In fact, I think too much of the intellect of the Senator, even though he had not said anything, to think that he thinks there is anything in this bill that is going to help anybody to any appreciable extent. That being true, the Democratic Party having promised immediate action to reduce the working hours, and the candidate having been elected largely on that promise and others of its kind, it seems to me that the party's duty now is to go ahead and get this 30-hour bill over to the other House of Congress.

I do not believe that the Senator from South Carolina will want to delay something that is good and virtuous, and has been promised, in order that this illustrious product of the pen of, as I understand, the Honorable Mordecai Ezekiel may have further consideration, to the detriment of other legislation. Perhaps I misinterpret what I believe is in the Senator's mind.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I desire to say that I think the pledge of the party to relieve agriculture was just as binding as the pledge of the party to relieve labor; and no matter what may be the opinion of any Senator in reference to the different principles or the different parts of this bill, I think it is the duty of the Senate and of the Congress to pass legislation for the relief of agriculture, and to do it to the very best of their ability, making it as effective as we are capable of making it.

For that reason, as long as I have charge of this bill or am chairman of the Agricultural Committee, I shall insist that we address ourselves to the relief of agriculture. After we have experimented with the railroads, after we have experimented with the banks, after we have experimented with the insurance companies, I think we have all come at last to understand that if we are to have relief from this terrible depression we must have it through a rise in commodity prices and the distribution of wealth throughout the agricultural and laboring classes so as to increase their purchasing power.

I do not believe this bill, if it were perfect, or the banking and currency bills that we have passed, can avail until we address ourselves to an expansion of the currency to a point where there will be such a cheapening of the purchasing power of the dollar as to raise adequately the purchasing power of commodities. We should have addressed ourselves to this currency question when we first convened and should have seen to it that the water in the stream of commerce was amply adequate to float all the vessels of communication between supply and demand. We have an unusual supply; we have a heart-breaking demand; and yet, bound by the shackles of conventional rules in reference to currency, we are suffering 12,000,000 people to be jobless and other untold millions to be threatened with the dispossession of what they think they own, or in which they have an equity. It is our duty now, before this session of Congress shall adjourn, to find relief from the terrible money stringency that is throttling commerce and destroying the hopes of the American people.

It is an indictment of the intelligence of the American people that we have an abundance of food, clothing, building materials, and all the luxuries that a nation should have, and in the midst of that have starvation, hunger, bankruptcy, and bank moratoriums. It is an indictment of our intelligence or our capacity to distribute the blessings of Providence and the wonderful gifts of the gods to us.

Here we are treating symptoms. We have dug a hole around the banks and let enough water trickle in to float them. They can go nowhere. The water in the stream of commerce is so low that Congress has addressed itself to digging holes in order to float them. They cannot go anywhere. They simply float; and here we are, attempting with the farm relief bill to raise the price of farm commodities when it is notorious that the people who consume the farm commodities have not now enough money to pay for them at the present bankrupt price that the farmer has to take!

That is not only true of farm products but it is true of the factory; it is true of the railroads; and why? Because we have not the ability to grasp the problem and solve it for the benefit of the distressed American people. We have heard Senators here denounce inflation. Take the picture from 1914 to 1920, in the midst of the most destructive period civilization ever saw, and in the midst of it the greatest prosperity that ever blessed America. Cotton rose to 40 cents a pound, wheat to $3 a bushel, labor to $12 to $14 a day. Old mortgages were paid. Old debts, against which the statute of limitations had run, were met and canceled. Enterprises were booming throughout the country. That kept up until May 1920. That was a period that was scornfully referred to as "the period of inflation." Then the board of governors of the Federal Reserve Board met, the advisory council, and the presidents of the 12 several banks, and they decided to deflate. Then began the toboggan slide which has resulted in the deflation of this hour.

Take the picture from 1920 to 1932, the period of gradual and then accelerated deflation, and compare it to the picture from 1914 to 1920, when the Federal Reserve Act first came into force, and was administered by its friends and a Democratic administration.

In the era from 1914 to 1920, prosperity and happiness characterized America, so far as business was concerned. In spite of the boom of the cannons in the fields of Europe, and the destruction of lives, here we were in the midst of the greatest prosperity the United States ever saw. Then deflation set in, brought on arbitrarily by that unthinkable crime of May 1920, and from that date to this we have gradually lessened the bargaining power of the masses until today we stand with real wealth beyond any kind of dream of mankind, and the power to distribute it and avail ourselves of it is denied us by a handful of bankers and their cohorts, who have strangled us and brought us to where we are, an indictment of every Senator.

Here we are today, asked by the President of the United States practically to suspend our judgment and our operations and give him a chance. Sometimes I feel like resenting it, but when I think what we have allowed the country to come to, I think that perhaps he is right. God knows we have not cured the evil. We go into our committee rooms and argue for days and days about the gold standard, and not one there understands what it means. We argue about the rehabilitation of silver, and not a man can explain the exchange value in terms of the movement of commerce. What we do know is that we are in the worst fix that ever a civilized people were in, in view of the magnificent gifts of Providence to us.

We cannot shift the responsibility, actually depending upon money, not upon the gifts of Providence. We have all the wealth America could possibly desire, and in the presence of all that, here we are, doling out a little gift to the young men who cannot make a living, getting them together in camps, giving them $30 a month if they will sign a contract that they will send $25 of that back to the helpless mother and children. My God! Have we got to where we have to debauch American citizenship at the threshold of life by making the young men the pensioners of the dole of their Government, and, with lifted brow and a wise air say, "Do not expand the currency. For God's sake, keep away from inflation."

If inflation will relieve us of this death, a man is not a patriot who would not vote for it in any form in order to relieve the situation. Whenever, by virtue of our banking laws, we compel an American citizen to hold out his hand for charity we destroy an American citizen by destroying his self-respect. With all due deference to those who formulated our forestry program and the concentrating of these boys, every man who enters one of those camps is changed forever in his attitude of manhood and his attitude toward his Government. It is tantamount to saying that in America there is no place for him to work out his own destiny and create a sufficiency for himself. It is tantamount to saying that, with other surpluses, we have a surplus of human beings in the United States.

Mr. President, I am looking for someone to introduce a bill to enforce birth control in order to get rid as nearly as possible of a portending increase of population. Why not? If there are 12,000,000 more than we can take care of now, what is the reason for raising another crop? We are asked to reduce cotton production because we cannot take care of what we have, and there is a demand for reduction in the production of wheat. Then is it not more than logical to ask for a reduction of 50 to 75 percent of the human crop? Why not? We are rendering ourselves ridiculous, and we ought to be rawhided for our inability to take care of the riches God has granted us and exhibit them for the blessing of the teeming American millions.

Mr. President, I want this bill as nearly as it can be made a blessing to agriculture. I will vote for every feature of it which I think can be helpful to the man in the field. I reserve the right to resist that which I do not think would be helpful, but would be disadvantageous to him.

As I said yesterday, I repeat today, no man on this floor is better qualified to know what are the needs of the man with the hoe and the man between the plow handles than myself. The philosophy of salvation rests upon the doctrine of personal experience. With all the power of the Deity, He could not save mankind, though He tried prophet, priest, and king, until He himself became a human being, born in a stable, to walk the lonely road which humanity has to walk, and if God could not save humanity without himself becoming a laborer, how do we expect the farmer to be saved by those who know not his tribulations, his problems, his home life, what it means for a man to see his own mother working her beautiful hands into unseemly sights, either in the field or at the washtub, seeing her have the beauty and bloom of her cheeks smitten away by the hard grind of labor, in order to do something for the children whom God has granted her?

Mr. President, those who live in comparative wealth, and are clothed in purple and fine linen, and fare sumptuously every day, cannot write an agricultural bill for me.

As has been said before, I hope that none who are opposed to this bill will oppose it for any political reasons, but if they find anything in it they think is wrong and not helpful, that as men they will stand up and give their reasons, and that they will stand here like men and vote for whatever is helpful.

I propose to do the best I can during the consideration of this bill to carry a measure of hope and gladness back to the millions who are out on the farm, who are voiceless here, who, unfortunately, are the "Chinese" of American economics, disorganized, individualistic, by virtue of their calling, but upon whom rests the whole superstructure of America's life now and for the future. Let us all unite to make this bill, regardless of who drafted it, as perfect and helpful as we can make it.

Mr. President, I am sorry to have taken up so much of the time of the Senate, but when one has a burden on his heart, there come times when he must get rid of it in some way.

CONCERNING DEMOCRATIC PROMISES

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I had not completed my remarks when the Senator from South Carolina took the floor, but I became deeply interested in what he said. The voice of the Senator from South Carolina expresses the feeling of at least 119,000,000 people of the United States today. What the Senator from South Carolina has said here in the last few minutes portrays the situation with 119,000,000 people in this country.

Mr. President, I am not informed, I will say to the Senator from South Carolina, but that the bill we now have before us was written by those who he says "fare sumptuously" while preparing a farm bill. The fact of the matter is that I have read the hearings, and it appears that this is one of that kind of bills. It has not come from the hands of the Senator from South Carolina to any extent.

I can understand the talk of the Senator, and I believe he knows something about farming and farm problems. I have studied valiantly for the last 24 hours to understand the "genius" behind this bill, as the Senator describes it, but I have been unable to do so. I have studied the tables I put in the RECORD yesterday, so that other Senators might study them, and I cannot understand this kind of language from one of the penmen of the bill, speaking of the price of hogs again:

The demand curve—

Says the pen of Mordecai Ezekiel—

for a given period may be thought of as moving forward through time and "generating" a solid surface in its wake. The curve would move forward with a generally upward trend, swinging above and below the trend in more or less rhythmic fashion with changing industrial activity, and also moving up or down slightly from time to time in response to changes in the price of alternative products, in the storage supplies, and in foreign demand. In addition the shape of the curve itself must be thought of as changing as it moves forward, the growing demand implying not merely an upward shift in the curve, but also a tendency for the shape of the curve itself to change.

[Laughter.]

I say, Mr. President, that I can understand the talk of the Senator from South Carolina; I can understand the superindignation he feels—that here we are with so much to eat and wear that we cannot enjoy it, and we have made ourselves ridiculous by not distributing the wealth among the people. I understand that kind of talk; the people of the United States understand that kind of talk; but, in dealing with these theories which come from the pen of the immortal Mordecai, I refer myself back to the Scriptures, to see whether or not we are not seeing them reenacted here in this present day and time.

[Demonstrations of laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). The Chair will have to admonish the occupants of the galleries that demonstrations are not permitted under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. LONG. I read from the seventh chapter of the Book of Esther, ninth to the tenth verses, as follows:

And Harbonah, one of the chamberlains, said before the king, Behold also, the gallows 50 cubits high, which Haman had made for Mordecai, who had spoken good for the king, standeth in the house of Haman. Then the king said, Hang him thereon.

It looks to me, Mr. President, that if the modern Mordecai prepared these gallows at the sacrifice of his own efforts in order that he might save the farmers, he has made a similar mistake to that made by Haman, for it is not going to be Mordecai but the people who are going to hang on this thing. It seems that Mordecai of that day occupied about the same position as the modern Mordecai does to the farm legislation now pending in the United States Senate.

In the tenth chapter of the Book of Esther, the tenth verse, it says:

So they hanged Haman on the gallows that he had prepared for Mordecai. Then was the king's wrath pacified.

Apparently he is the progenitor of this particular legislation.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CAREY. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana if Mr. Mordecai Ezekiel is not the assistant to the Secretary of Agriculture, having been selected as economic adviser?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; he is connected with the Democratic administration. We got him from the Republicans; he is one of our inheritances; he is one of the failures described by our "new deal" rather than of the "new deal" itself. This book prepared by Mr. Mordecai Ezekiel was prepared when he was working under Mr. Arthur Hyde, and he was kept over to administer affairs for us.

Why that is so I cannot understand. I remind the Senator from South Carolina and others connected with the conception and passing of this proposed legislation that we went out in the campaign telling the people of America we were going to get rid of these theorists who had failed in the Agricultural Department and the Treasury Department and in the Federal Reserve Board and in various other positions of power; but every time we try to do something to unravel this orgy of misery and extravagance and distress and starvation, we are presented with something that is the handiwork of one of that clique that we promised 120,000,000 people we were going to kick out of office when we got in. That is the source from which comes the bill the Senator from South Carolina is having to sponsor now. I feel sorry for the Senator. I am glad he is chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; I am glad I am one of the nondescripts on the outside when it comes to the chairmanship or to membership on that committee.

Mr. President, we came along with a banking bill to correct the distress that has been caused by the Federal Reserve Bank Board and the Treasury Department as the laws were administered by them during the last 12 years. We found the currency deflated; the banks breaking; the purchasing power in the hands of the masses practically gone, and, in order to get legislation to correct this tragedy of events, we have allowed the same clique to fortify themselves with a number of others who did not dare to show their faces here when Herbert Hoover was President, but who worked behind the veil. We have allowed even the partners of Morgan & Co. to come here and attach themselves to this clique which is drawing the laws, and they have brought about a situation that is twofold more the son of hell than what we promised to rectify in the election we held on the 8th day of last November. Parker Gilbert, from Morgan & Co., Leffingwell, Ballantine, Eugene Meyer, every one of them is here; and whatever you try to concoct—I do not care whether it is by the genius of the Senator from California or from the Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, the Senator from Florida, or whether it comes from the House, we here in Washington know that they have got this thing in hand. What is the use of hemming and hawing about it? We know who is running this thing.

They have closed thousands and thousands of banks in the United States since the 3d day of March, and they have not finished with their work yet, if they shall have their way and shall be permitted to stay here, as every one of them is now staying. And here we are fishing with that "dad-gummed" kind of a thing called a farm bill to relieve the distress that is prevalent among the farmers of the country today.

Why are we not going to get rid of the Federal Reserve Board? I stood on this floor and demanded that that be done. I want to say that I heard through reliable channels that there was not any doubt that we were going to remove that board; that, in the position I took, I was reckoning without my host; that the Federal Reserve Board was going to be removed and that we were going to have a liberalization in the administration of the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve Board. I heard that from sources that inspired me to confidence, but we have not seen that done.

Mr. President, as time went on and matters began to grow worse, we were informed by the press that we were doing things at a rapid rate to improve conditions. This morning I stepped over to the American Federation of Labor, and they said, "Senator, there are nearly 200,000 more men out of work now than were out of work on the 4th day of March." And that is not all. I telephoned a leading executive of one of the largest corporations in this country so that I might get the other side of the tale. He said, "Only a few days ago I realized that I had to reduce the employees in one department. I called in one man and discharged him. He immediately committed suicide. I called in a lady and discharged her, and she fainted; so I cut her wages in half and took her back. I called in another one to discharge her, but she was going up to the top of the building and jump off, so I hired her back. That," he said, "is the condition prevailing, even in this executive department which I am undertaking to handle." If any Senator questions the veracity of the statement which has been furnished me, I shall be pleased to give him, in private, the names and addresses of my informants and the particulars of what they told me. There is not any use messing around about the situation; there is not any use talking about it.

We had a 30-hour-week bill here. It was proposed in order that good might be accomplished, and it would, I think, have done good. We were going to say that the iron machines that have put thousands of men out of work would be taken into account in sharing the work opportunities in this land. The day the drag line levee builder was invented, by which 2 men could build as many levees in a week as a thousand men could build, 900 men were put out of work. The Democratic Party had promised, and the Republican Party had made about the same promise, though not so sincerely, I am thankful to say, to shorten the hours of work. I have not seen anything done here to indicate that we were doing very much to pass the 30-hour week bill as an administration project. I have not seen anything here to indicate that there is anything like the same pressure and power behind the bill to give everybody some work to do by shortening the hours of labor as there was behind the economy bill. But we passed the nefarious, iniquitous economy bill. I received a letter from one of the soldiers, which I will read:

APRIL 5, 1933.

Hon. HUEY P. LONG.

DEAR SIR: Now that my compensation has been cut I will have no further use for my teeth.

Will you please present them with my compliments to some Senator who will be able to use them?

Very truly yours,

JOHN MCBURNIE,
818 Chester Williams, Los Angeles, Calif.

[Laughter in the galleries.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VANDENBERG in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LONG. I yield for a question or for a confession only.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I answer that by saying I have no confession to make, but when I have one to make it will be one with teeth in it. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I rise to ask that the Chair direct the Sergeant at Arms to preserve order in the galleries. The Senate is treated from time to time by those in the reserved galleries and in the other galleries as if this were a moving-picture theater. There may be moving-picture performances in this body, to our regret, but the Senate is not a moving-picture assemblage. I beg to call the attention of those in the galleries to the fact that this is the United States Senate; its rules are well understood and its dignity, and we ask on the part of our guests such decorum as becomes both the assemblage and the speaker who holds his audience.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana will suspend while the Chair states to the occupants of the galleries that they are here as the guests of the Senate and, under the rules of the Senate, must desist from any manifestations of levity or of approval or disapproval.

Mr. LONG. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, as the Senator has been so courteous as to say he would yield to me for a question, I desire, instead of a question, to say to the Senator, with reference to his intimation concerning the 30-hour bill being an administration measure, that it has been brought before this body, its virtues have been set forth, opposition to it has been declared; but there has been nothing anywhere at any time, so far as I am informed, that indicates that it is presented as an administration measure. It is a measure before the Senate, introduced and presented by an individual Senator.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, that is exactly my understanding of it; but that measure, or something like it, has been promised by the Democratic Party. It has not only been promised by the platform; it has been promised by the candidate and by those of us who were sent out to speak for the candidates and for the party. Before I went out to make any speeches I asked the candidate himself if we were to speak along that line, and I was informed that we were, and the candidate himself made some speeches along that line.

I want to ask, Mr. President, what has gotten wrong with the party? We have a bill here that has been adopted as representing the wisdom of a large majority of the party and of a large majority of this body, and then the National Chamber of Commerce and the National Economy League and the manufacturers' association get in the way of it. What has gotten wrong with us that we do not make it an administration measure and try to put it through here?

We made the economy bill an administration measure and it went through so fast it looked as if it was greased. We made the economy bill an administration measure, taking money out of the pockets of the people who needed it, Mr. President; we cut the wages of employees to such an extent that we knew they could not live on what was left. Do you think, Mr. President, I am the only man who thinks that? I will read to you a little newspaper clipping printed in the Washington Herald of this morning:

UNITED STATES AVERAGE PAY TOO LOW, MRS. F. D. SAYS—FIRST LADY ATTACKS MARRIAGE CLAUSE IN THE ECONOMY ACT

The average Government salary is too low to support a family of more than two in her opinion, Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt told reporters yesterday at her weekly press conference.

Defending the stand of Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins against the marriage clause of the Economy Act, Mrs. Roosevelt said she felt strongly that dismissal from the Federal Government should be made on the basis of efficiency and of good to the service.

While the clause might be necessary as an emergency measure, she said, one average Government salary fails to support a family of 3 or 4 children or other dependents.

I could quote from other authority, Mr. President, not quite so high but to the same effect.

We have got to go back before the American people when the Congress adjourns—and by the way, that is a good reason why we should not adjourn. We had better stay in session here for a while, because if we go back now we will not have much to recommend ourselves, and I am one of the few who do not want to go home until we have done a little bit more. However, we have got to go back. We have got to go back to the men and women and children from whose mouths we have taken food and from whose backs we have taken clothes and tell them the story. They may ask, "By what right, under what theory, for what cause have you passed the National Economy Act and taken bread out of the mouths of the hungry and clothes off the backs of the naked?" And we have got to tell them about it, and say that the bill was passed in order that the balance of the administration program could go through whole and sound. Well, what is the balance of that program? Close up half the banks—that is some more of it—deflate the currency, as we have done—that is some more of it—and above all, we have this gracious and glorious and wonderful sapling-tree-planting bill, now known as the "sapling bill"; and when Senators come up for election, it will be the sapsucker's bill, if they put one of those things in the States from which they happen to come.

One dollar a day is to be spent to assemble men from the four corners of the earth, from Dan to Beersheba, and to send the men to some little creek corner to plant some more trees. I will eat every one of them that comes up in my State. We are not going to have any planted there. We are not going to ask for one to be planted in our State. I am informed that my State is going to show it is the right kind of self-sacrificing State. We are not going to ask the Government to send one of these tree-planting establishments to put out any saplings in the State of Louisiana. We are going to send them to South Carolina and Virginia.

Mr. President, it looks to me as if it is high time something were done. I want to stay on good terms with the administration, and I am going to do so if it is possible, but I do not have to. I made a living by cutting cordwood before I ever came here, and I can make it again if there is anybody left to burn the wood.

I do not have to stand in with the administration; neither does anybody else. I am not going to flatter my friend about this thing, and I am a friend of the President of the United States. There are more people out of work today than there were the day he went into office. There are more people hungry now and more banks closed now. There are more banks going to close. There are people crying and waiting, and every time we hope we are going to get something through here to correct this condition of unemployment and to feed these people and inflate the currency and remonetize silver and depreciate the value of the gold dollar in some way to bring up commodity prices, all we have to do is just inquire long enough and wait long enough and we find that that old bunch of disciples, the same old Federal Reserve outfit, the same old Treasury outfit, the same old Comptroller's outfit, the same old set with their grandparents and ancestors, have moved in here; and if they advise to the contrary, then nothing comes here in the form of relief for the people of the country. I am tired of it. The people are tired of it.

I have read in the papers—I do not know how other Senators feel about it, but I want to tell you how I feel about it—that we are all being held in line with patronage, that they are not handing out the jobs yet and that we are all being good until the jobs are handed out. I resent that. That is not what has inspired the men of the Senate to stand by and vote for the bills that come here. They have carried along the President time after time when they doubted the wisdom and virtues of these bills, trying to submerge their own opinions in order to help the administration pull the country out of the mud. I have not voted for these bills because I feared I was not going to get any patronage. So far as I am concerned in voting, they can take my patronage and go. They can keep the patronage I have coming from this administration, and I will be unchanged. None of us is going to be helped by this constant belittling of men in the United States Senate. There is no honor for us if we are going to allow that kind of impression to go rampant throughout the country. This constant impression and press propaganda are being spread that 96 men who are supposed to have enough integrity about them, enough intellect about them, and enough honor about them to come here as ambassadors from the sovereign States—this press propaganda—that men of that kind are being held in line and made to vote for what they otherwise would not vote for if it was not for the expectation of jobs. That kind of belittling of this august and deliberative body is going on, and no man sitting in the United States Senate cannot but feel that he is aggravating his own importance among his people with that kind of thing going on.

Mr. President, I am with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] in this matter. He may not vote as I vote, but he speaks as I speak and he thinks as I think. [Laughter.] Mr. President, I ask for order in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. LONG. I am with the Senator from South Carolina in this respect. It is in nearly all respects that I am with him. We have swallowed enough of this stuff. We swallowed that abominable banking scheme that was brought in here. It was a horrible thing we did, an awful thing, an outrage on the public conscience and on justice, and yet we swallowed it hook, line, and sinker. We did not even read it. The clerk read it and we adopted it. That is one thing we did.

Then the economy bill was brought in here, and it was said that we had to balance the Budget, and Senators made the most eloquent speeches I have ever heard in the Senate, declaring that we had to make the sacrifice to balance the Budget; that we had to take $400,000,000 away from the war veterans in order to balance the Budget; and yet next day there came a bill to provide for $300,000,000 for planting saplings, and Senators all voted for it. We took away $400,000,000 from the veterans to balance the Budget, and then the next day spent $300,000,000 to plant saplings. Then we came in with another bill to appropriate $500,000,000 more, making $800,000,000 all together, so that the Budget was still $400,000,000 out of line when we got through with those three bills. That is the kind of laudanum you swallowed, and I have done it, too. I have voted against but one bill.

We had the general help of the Republicans. There is one good old thing that can be said for the Republican Party. It may stand in the way of some of the things the Democratic Party wants to do, but it sure will help the Democratic Party build a scaffold for itself any time it gets ready. The Republican Party has never gotten in the way of the Democratic Party when the Democratic Party is trying to commit suicide. I have never seen anything of that sort as long as I have been here. I have seen the Democratic Party pull the chestnuts out of the fire for the Republican Party, but I will have to say that I do not miss the mark of my enemies, that I have never seen them refuse to help the Democratic Party on its way to destruction so long as the Democratic Party was not destroying anybody but itself.

We have had to explain many things, and it is time now that we begin to think. There are men in this body to whom the President of the United States and others will listen. There are men here with whom I have not always agreed, who are men of mature knowledge and thought, and sound judgment on economic and technical lines as well.

It is up to you, Senators, if you are going to support the administration program as I have been doing and as you have been doing. It is up to somebody to go down to the White House and tell the President of the United States what we know is happening here in this country. It is up to you to go down there and tell him the people of the United States expected the members of the Federal Reserve Board to be put out of there or they would not have voted the way they did; that they expect the whole "dadgummed" outfit, from top to bottom, to be wiped out; that they do not expect that a partner in the J. P. Morgan house shall be sitting as the veto agency on financial and banking legislation; that if they are going to have a farm bill the people expect it to be written by the Democrats of this country who have sponsored the kind of farm philosophy that has been looked upon with favor by the people of the United States, rather than taking some half-baked scheme that comes out of one of the penmen who was left there by Mr. Arthur Hyde when he left office. It is up to us to say we are going to carry out this platform; and if that is done, there is some hope for the Democratic Party.

Mr. President, I have taken more time than I expected. I wish to say just this in conclusion. I am not reckoning without my host. I am not falling out with the President. The Bible says, "He who flattereth his friend his eyes should fall from his head." The man who is a friend of Franklin D. Roosevelt and flatters him today with this great big holier-than-thou propaganda, that "you are doing the right thing, old boy, and it is just going fine", may ingratiate himself in his presence, but it is leading him to destruction, and we and the people are going right there with him.

I am not going to advise him that way. On the contrary, I am going to tell him that he has not gone the route that the Democratic Party wants with this 30-hour-week bill. I am going to say more than that. I am going to repeat the words of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], that we have got to depreciate the value of the mammon of gold and we have got to redistribute wealth.

I have in my hands the words of the President himself, the words of the Democratic platform, and without taking the time to read them, because they are very extensive and complete along that line, I merely wish to say that the Democratic Party won the last election on the promise, first, that there would be a distribution of wealth among the people; second, that there would be a financial policy of kicking out all the old gang and the old system, and putting in one that is suitable to the people; third, that we were going to shorten the hours of the workday and the days of the workweek so that there might be consumption to keep pace with production; and, fourth, that we would give adequate relief to the farmers of the country.

Those are the cardinal cornerstones of the promises of the Democratic Party. We have not undertaken to carry them out. We have not put any purchasing power in the hands of the masses. We have not shortened the hours of work. We have not inflated the currency. We have not changed the Federal Reserve Board. We have not put in a new policy, and today we are twiddling our thumbs and arguing over a tweedledum-and-tweedledee proposition involved in the bill which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has introduced and as to which he himself expresses the belief that in many of its essential particulars he doubts if it can be of any advantage to the farmer or accord the promised relief.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I do not desire to add any gloom to that which pervades the country at the present time. I am in agreement with a great deal that has been said by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], but in that connection I desire to read a letter from a prominent business man in Indiana which has just come to me.

The C. G. Conn Co., Ltd., is one of the largest manufacturers of band instruments in the world. The president of that company is Mr. C. D. Greenleaf, of Elkhart, Ind. I read this letter, which has just come to me from Mr. Greenleaf:

C. G. CONN, LTD.,
Elkhart, Ind., April 7, 1933.

Hon. ARTHUR R. ROBINSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR ROBINSON: I have not written you with regard to the business situation, as I realize that you had thousands of letters and that you cannot pay attention to all of the ideas of your constituents. The situation is such, however, at this time that I feel like putting my views before you. We have now had more than 3 years of constant deflation, and the pace is now more rapid than it has ever been. Since the bank moratorium it has been going on at what is, in my judgment, an impossible rate. The situation is that while the wealth of the country consists of the farms, the homes, the factories, the railroads, etc., all of this property has become practically worthless, and the only thing which is worth anything like 100 cents on the dollar is Government bonds. To realize the full absurdity of the situation it is only necessary to remember that the value of the Government bonds depends entirely upon the taxing power of this same property, which has become worthless and which is rapidly reaching the place where it cannot even pay taxes. Then the Government bonds, too, will join the list of worthless property, and the cycle will be complete. Of course, it is inconceivable that it will be carried to this point. Nevertheless this will be the inexorable result if the present policies are continued.

An effort is now being made to reopen the banks in this country. Prior to 1933 many thousands of banks failed, and it is fair to assume that the really unsound and poorly managed banks had been eliminated up to this time. Most of those which were left would be sound, in my judgment, on any reasonable basis of value. However, speaking of the banks outside of the larger cities, all of the liquid assets have been paid out, and those which are remaining are frozen. This does not mean that they are worthless, but that they cannot be converted into cash at the present time without tremendous losses to the depositors. Nevertheless an effort is being made to force these banks into a liquid condition by injecting new capital. In most communities this is an impossibility under present conditions without outside help. Of course, the only outside help available is that from the R.F.C. On the other hand, the R.F.C. insists on valuing bank assets on the present depreciated basis, which is to deny practically all value to local assets. This makes the situation an impossible one; and if this policy is carried out to its ultimate conclusion, in my judgment this country will not recover from its effects for 50 years.

The only alternative that I can see is some method of bringing back values to what may be considered a normal basis. I have always been opposed personally to all forms of inflation, but I am now of the opinion that it is the only solution and that only by some measure of this kind can the complete collapse of the country be avoided. Of all the methods proposed, I believe that a reduction in the value of the gold in the dollar is the most feasible. While a few weeks ago even a discussion of this plan would have caused a flight of capital from this country which would have ruined it, this cannot happen at the present time, owing to the fact that we have now control of the situation. The Treasury is making an effort to get into the banks the balance of the gold which is now in the country and outside of the banks. If this can be successfully done, we will then be in an ideal position to increase the value of the gold, and the public will get the benefit of the change. Even if it proves to be impossible to get the billion dollars of outside gold into the banks, I still think the plan must be followed. It is possible that this is the plan which the authorities have in mind. If so, and if it is carried out promptly, I believe our troubles will soon be over.

However, if it is the intention to carry out what is essentially the same thing by means of a voluntary writing-down of debts, such as is involved in the new farm-bond measure, the proposed railroad-reorganization measure, etc., the result will be that the country will be engaged in this process for years to come, that it will be very inequitably accomplished, and that the vast majority of people will be bankrupt before it can be accomplished.

Generally speaking, time is the essence of the matter. The deflation has been going on so long most businesses and individuals are reduced to such a low ebb that they cannot stand it much longer. I have never seen business men in such a hopeless state of mind as they are at present. They have fought this thing with great resourcefulness and courage up to the present time, but most of them do not see how they are going to carry it on much longer. I believe that the plan as outlined by what is known as the Committee for the Nation to Rebuild Prices and Purchasing Power is the most feasible of anything which has been offered, and I am in hopes that action along this line can be taken in the near future.

A letter identical to this is being sent to Senator VAN NUYS.

Yours very truly,

C. D. GREENLEAF, President.

Mr. President, that letter, as I stated at the beginning, comes from one of the most prominent business men in the United States. He, like everybody else, I think, recognizes the fact that this deflation is taking us constantly down hill; and somewhere or other we must put on the brakes and go upgrade, or we will have a catastrophe in this country by the first of July that none of us today even dares contemplate.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in the remarks I made a moment ago I devoted myself more particularly to what I considered to be the outstanding need of this country; namely, an increased circulating medium.

I do not want any mistake on the part of my colleagues in this body as to my attitude toward this farm relief bill. It has been asked for by the administration. In its present form it has been endorsed and sent down here by the Department of Agriculture. Every man who has read the bill understands that there are three principles in it now, two of which have been endorsed by the Department, and one of which has been largely endorsed by the farming population of this country. The two principles that have been endorsed by the Department are one known as the leasing feature, which is incorporated in the bill, and which the Secretary of Agriculture may use or not, as he sees fit. The other is the allotment plan, which he may use or not use. The third principle, if the Senate or the Congress sees fit to adopt it and incorporate it as a part of the bill, constitutes what is known as the production-cost plan.

I shall not attempt, and have not attempted, to indicate my personal attitude toward any of these plans; but I take it for granted that the Secretary of Agriculture, following the message of the President of the United States, will try these plans, and whichever one in his judgment promises the best and the greatest results will be adopted as the policy of the Government. Therefore, I want it definitely understood that I hope this body will address itself to the consideration of this bill and pass, at the earliest possible date, whatever its Members decide to be the expression of their will so that those standing in such dire need of aid may receive it.

With that expression on my part, Mr. President, I intend to insist that this bill shall be kept before this body, as far as I am able to do it—and I hope that I shall have the assistance of my colleagues—until final disposition is made of it. It is essential for us to pass the farm relief bill.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I think we are all in sympathy with what the Senator is saying. It is going to take a little time to consider some of the items that are so controversial. I am receiving a good deal of correspondence asking what certain sections of the bill mean. I think the Senator recognizes that there is a good deal of basis for doubt.

For example, this morning I received a letter from an ex-president of the American Bar Association who makes specific inquiry as to what certain sections of the bill mean, saying that their meaning is doubtful in his mind. For example, he says:

I am unable to understand just who has to pay the tax in the first instance, to whom it is paid, how it is refunded, and to whom. The machinery of the thing seems to me very indefinite. When, and on what occasion does the Secretary of Agriculture make a change of rates of taxes?

The Senator will recall that on yesterday there was quite a triangular colloquy between the chairman of the committee, the leader of the Senate, and the Senator from Texas, on the latter question which is raised; and for the sake of the RECORD, so that those who read the RECORD will understand the situation, I wish we might have an authoritative statement on the subject.

Mr. SMITH. I am glad the Senator has asked the question, because the committee devoted considerable time to that very matter.

In the first place, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to advance to the Secretary of Agriculture a sufficient amount to make these payments pending the collection of the tax.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator is incorrect in saying that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized. It is the Secretary of Agriculture who is authorized.

Mr. SMITH. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to make the advances.

Mr. FESS. No; that is for the cotton provision. I am speaking now of the general basic tax.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized under the second tax to make advances, pending the collection of the tax, to an amount sufficient to meet the bonus or the amortization or whatever it may be called until the tax shall be collected.

A farmer or anyone who goes up to sell a product, after the amount of the tax is fixed, sells to his local agent at the ordinary market price, regardless of the tax. He is given a statement as to the number of bushels he has sold in the case of wheat, or the number of pounds in the case of cotton. He then goes to his county commissioner, who figures out what percentage of the product is to be exported, and what percentage is to be domestically consumed. Then the amount of bonus or tax is figured on the part that is domestically consumed, and the farmer is given a certificate of his equity to the amount of the percentage of the product that is domestically consumed. Then the processor has 30 days or 60 days in which to adjust his sales, after the processing tax goes on, before he is to pay—that is, until such time as the rise in price of the commodity shall have been adjusted. He has 60 days. At the end of that time he remits to the Treasury the amount of the tax.

Mr. FESS. So the processor pays the tax?

Mr. SMITH. The processor pays the tax.

Mr. FESS. That is the first step.

Mr. SMITH. The Treasury gives credit to the Secretary of Agriculture according to the slips that have gone in. Then there is remitted to the county commissioner the amount of the slips that each one has. In the meantime the producer may have transferred the slip to a bank, but whoever holds that slip can cash it after notice is given that it is ready to be cashed.

Mr. FESS. That comes out of the Treasury?

Mr. SMITH. That comes out of the Treasury, and the Treasury credits itself with the tax as it comes in.

For instance, say the Treasury were to advance $50,000,000 to meet the bonuses as they come in. As these taxes are then remitted to the Secretary from the processor, he credits the account with that amount.

Mr. FESS. So, in answer to the question of my correspondent, the tax is paid by the processor?

Mr. SMITH. The first domestic processor.

Mr. FESS. It first goes to the Treasury, and latterly it is paid to the producer, the farmer.

Mr. SMITH. That is correct.

Mr. FESS. The next question was, What about refunds?

Mr. SMITH. As I understand it, whenever the processor is entitled to a refund he makes out his statement according to the amount that is indicated, to which he certifies. That is forwarded to the Secretary of the Treasury, who, upon that certificate, refunds to the processor whatever excess amount he has paid.

Mr. FESS. The authority to refund is in the bill now?

Mr. SMITH. It is in the bill now. There has been some misapprehension, and I have had quite a lot of inquiries myself, and I presume others have. Those having a floor stock against which they have already sold the finished article and have not yet converted it, can process that stock, send it to the vendee, and pay no tax; but the vendee must pay the tax, going upon the assumption, as explained to our committee, that the processor having bought the raw material before the tax went into effect and having sold the finished goods for future delivery against that floor stock, can carry out his contract, but the vendee—that is, the party receiving the goods—must pay the tax.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, would the Senator permit a question?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. REED. During the World War, when wheat was scarce and expensive, the people of every country resorted to the use of potatoes in order to get the starch component which they had been getting from wheat. Under this bill, if that were done, would the Secretary of Agriculture have authority to put a tax on potatoes?

Mr. SMITH. Immediately.

Mr. REED. From whom would he collect the tax?

Mr. SMITH. He would collect the tax, I presume, from the vendor.

Mr. REED. He would collect it from the processor, according to the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. REED. Who is the processor of a potato?

Mr. SMITH. That is a question which the Senator will himself have to figure out. The object is, as I understand it, to give the Secretary the power to put the tax on any article competing with one of the enumerated articles.

Mr. REED. Precisely; and we learned during the World War that potatoes are a competing commodity when wheat gets high or gets scarce. The tax, under section 11, I think it is, is to be imposed upon the processor of competing commodities. I am wondering whether that would be the little girl who peels the potato or the elderly lady who cooks it.

Mr. SMITH. I do not know. If I were the Secretary of Agriculture, I would find the most convenient and the most appropriate place to apply the tax.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I just want to suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Department would not do any such thing; it would not levy a processing tax upon any commodity if the tax were not collectible.

Mr. REED. I hope that is so.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CAREY. As I understand the bill, the prices of agricultural commodities are practically guaranteed; that is, to be brought up to the prices paid during certain periods of time.

Mr. SMITH. That is true.

Mr. CAREY. What would happen in connection with the processor's tax if the price of the raw commodity were falling from day to day? Would not that mean that each day the Secretary would have to determine a different tax upon the processed article?

Mr. SMITH. No. I tried to explain that yesterday. I think the bill is commendable in that respect, for this reason: Suppose, as the bill says, that there should be a certain date taken as a base for comparison of the hundred-cent farmer dollar and the hundred-cent dollar of the thing he purchases. I am familiar with cotton and will use that as an illustration. Suppose today the price of cotton is 6 cents a pound, and the ultimate parity which they wish to reach, which they have found by computation existed between 1909 and 1914, is 12 cents. Then the tax would be 6 cents a pound, because 6 added to 6 would make 12. The party purchasing the cotton is required to give a statement of the price paid for the cotton, and if he pays 6 cents then the processor must pay on that domestically consumed an additional 6 cents.

Suppose cotton drops a cent. The parity is 12 and it drops to 5. The man who buys the cotton makes out a statement saying that he bought the cotton at 5 cents a pound. Then the processor pays 7 cents a pound to equalize it with 12.

Mr. CAREY. Then what would happen? Say the processor entered into a contract to deliver finished goods at a certain price, based on the 6-cent tax, and the Secretary raised the tax to 7 cents. How could he fulfill the contract without losing money?

Mr. SMITH. It is supposed that the price of any cotton used for domestic purposes is controlled almost entirely by the consumer—that is, the different mills. They notify their trade what they are willing to pay, through their purchasing agent, and when they are willing to pay 7 cents a pounds, as a matter of course, they have already made their arrangements for that 7 cents.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption there?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. REED. If I have understood the Senator correctly, then on the same day two persons may purchase cotton, one, let us say, buying it at 5 cents and the other buying it at 6 cents, due to differences in location, or some such cause.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. REED. The tax on one of them is 100 percent, or 6 cents, while the tax on the other is 120 percent, or 7 cents, on the same article on the same day.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator regard that as giving the equal protection of the law to both of those citizens?

Mr. SMITH. I do, for the reason that the party purchasing knows, by proclamation, that the tax is to bring the price up to 12 cents, and if a man gets his cotton for 5 cents he is not benefited for the reason that he has to pay a 7-cent tax.

Mr. REED. Apparently not, if we can impose two differing rates of tax on the same commodity on the same day.

Mr. SMITH. I beg the Senator's pardon; we are not imposing two different rates of tax.

Mr. REED. One is 100 percent and one is 120 percent.

Mr. SMITH. We are imposing a uniform parity, and the trade must look out for itself. That is what we are doing. Do not confuse that. It must bring 12 cents a pound.

Mr. REED. I am not confusing it; it is confusing me.

Mr. SMITH. I cannot help that; I am sorry.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, is this tax to be imposed on the processed article or on the raw material?

Mr. SMITH. It is on the value of the raw material.

Mr. CAREY. It is not on the processed article?

Mr. SMITH. No.

Mr. CAREY. I should like to ask another question. Assuming that the Secretary should decide to use the method of leasing lands, how would he determine the amount of land it would be necessary to lease in order to raise the price?

Mr. SMITH. It is estimated that there are 350,000,000 acres of arable land in the United States. That is all of that kind of land. The Secretary will estimate how much of that is really in productive use, and what percentage of that, upon the average production of any given crop, it would be necessary to eliminate for the purposes of reducing production. Having ascertained that, and the amount necessary to lease it, to rent it, he would then fix a tax upon the processing for all the commodity processed, not for that domestically consumed but for all the commodity, in order to raise a sufficient fund to pay a reasonable amount for leasing the land desired to be taken.

Mr. CAREY. I think the Senator misunderstood my question. My question was, How could the Secretary determine the amount of land necessary to be leased in order to raise the price?

Mr. SMITH. Upon the percentage of production per acre. Take cotton, for instance. When 48,000,000 acres of land are planted to cotton the average over a period of 10 years has been 13,000,000 bales, let us say. The Secretary will estimate how much land planted to cotton it will be necessary to eliminate in order to reduce the production of cotton to the amount desired. The same is true of wheat, the same of rice, and the same of corn.

Mr. CAREY. That would really be an estimate? He could not bring the price exactly to where he wanted it?

Mr. SMITH. No; because seasons would have a good deal to do with the outcome.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, yesterday a number of Senators inquired whether it would be possible to meet earlier tomorrow and recess or adjourn at a very early hour tomorrow afternoon, thus putting in a full day in the Senate and affording Members of the Senate an opportunity to attend a game of baseball, which is the opening event of that character of the season. I had hoped to be able to make an arrangement looking toward that end.

It is now approximately 4 o'clock, and, with the exception of the last few minutes, the entire day has been consumed in the transaction of business other than the consideration of the pending bill and in the discussion of subjects which, in my opinion, are not germane to the bill now before the Senate.

When the Senator from Louisiana concluded his remarks I made an effort to take the floor in order to take note of some of the observations he made. First, with respect to the pending bill. As heretofore announced by the President himself, the measure is in large sense experimental. In my humble judgment, upon the manner of its administration depend in large part the benefits which may be expected to be derived by farmers from the enactment.

It would not be possible for anyone to anticipate in accurate detail what the sum total of the benefits under the measure will be. It does not seem to me, however, that it ought to be condemned as not worth while, inasmuch as it is the one measure which has come to the front in the Congress during the last few months as a result of the best study that has been given to the question.

On a previous day it was my privilege to discuss some of the features of the bill and to attempt to justify it. I shall not repeat the remarks then made.

Mr. President, to that part of the discussion that was not related to the pending bill I wish to say that it seems unjust to me to attack the President or the present administration for the existence of the conditions described by both the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON].

It is a very easy thing to find fault, but in trying circumstances like those which have prevailed for a long period, and for every day that has elapsed since the 4th of March, it has not been an easy task to perform the functions of Chief Executive of this Nation. Manifestly it has been impossible to make all the corrections that ought to be made, to eliminate from office all whose removal might be calculated to contribute to an improvement in the administration of national affairs, and certainly it has not been possible within the very short period that has passed since the present administration was inaugurated to put into effect all the measures contemplated by the Democratic national platform or the measures which may be in due course worked out for the advancement of the public interest.

I make this statement: In spite of the criticisms that are being hurled at the President, in spite of the charges that have been made against him, he has led in the accomplishment of more during the little more than 4 weeks that he has served as Chief Executive than was ever accomplished during a comparable period in the history of this Nation.

I know that conditions continue to be distressing; I know that the clouds have not lifted and that the sun is not shining through in undimmed splendor; but I undertake to assert, in spite of what has been said here today and what will be said tomorrow, that never before in a comparable period in the history of the United States have so many important measures been advanced and enacted by Congress as during the period that has passed since the 4th of March. I think it is unfair—grossly unfair—to charge to the President responsibility for the existing banking conditions. Everyone within the sound of my voice will remember that the former President contemplated issuing an order closing down the banks of the country; that he only refrained from doing so for the reason that no agreement was reached with the representatives of the incoming administration as to the time for which his order should remain effective; but everyone realizes that the closing of thousands of banks in every part of the country, some of them absolutely insolvent, others partially insolvent, others still we believe wholly solvent, involved a task insofar as reopening was concerned that could not be accomplished safely and soundly within a few hours; and I do not think it is just or fair to charge responsibility upon the President for the failure to reopen all the banks that were closed. Some of them cannot be reopened with safety to the depositors and with safety to the stockholders. Gigantic efforts were made; many banks were reopened, and there was a comparatively slight but, nevertheless, a substantial improvement in the business conditions prevailing throughout the country.

Mr. President, the economy measure has been characterized by both the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] as worthy of every form of criticism; it has been denounced. Nevertheless, a serious condition confronted the Treasury of the United States when President Roosevelt took office. An enormous deficit had been incurred, and that deficit was rapidly growing. Congress had been expending and authorizing the expenditure of sums far in excess of the revenues that were being received by the Government. It was a manly, a courageous, act to call a halt in those expenditures and to say, "You have already gone too far; from now on you ought to limit expenditures to revenues, so that the credit of the Government of the Nation, which is of paramount importance, shall be preserved, for without that credit the whole business structure of the country inevitably will collapse."

I think it was an act of courage on the part of the Executive to take the initiative in that movement that we had been talking about in both Houses of Congress for many months, but we had not been able to muster that concerted action which was necessary to accomplish something decisive; and already there is in sight as a result of his efforts an annual reduction in the cost of the National Government approximating $1,000,000,000; already there is an assurance that the Budget will be balanced. Oh, yes; one may ridicule proposals to balance the Budget. Nevertheless, it is essential to the progress of the Government; it is essential to the welfare of the public.

Oh, yes; it is said that we spent more money than we saved through the Economy Act, and the measures that were passed through which the expenditures referred to were authorized were impliedly ridiculed. What were those measures? The sum of $500,000,000 for destitution relief, $500,000,000 of Federal funds made available to keep people from suffering and starvation.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator understand that the Senator from Louisiana ridiculed the $500,000,000 expenditure for relief purposes?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Louisiana referred—I remember his language—to the $500,000,000 relief bill, and added it to the reforestation bill, and said that we had spent $400,000,000 more than we had saved, ridiculing the effort thus made to afford relief.

Mr. LONG. I was not ridiculing the $500,000,000 expenditure for relief purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Louisiana may put his own construction on his language. I am not trying to misrepresent him.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Arkansas might also say that the $500,000,000 for destitution would have been required regardless of the reduction in the other items necessary to balance the Budget, and if we had not reduced the expenditures we would have had the $500,000,000 on top of them.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not understand the Senator from Louisiana to object to the $500,000,000 relief bill. His statement just made indicates his support of it, but it is unfair, in my judgment, to criticize the President for favoring or advancing that bill and for the results that must accrue from it. If you are for the bill, then do not denounce your President for being for it, too.

Then much fun was made of the Civilian Conservation Corps measure—"planting saplings." Oh, yes; there are not going to be any saplings planted in Louisiana, the Senator from Louisiana stated; that is a State in which there will not be any reforestation so far as he is concerned; it must be confined to South Carolina and Virginia.

I know that the reforestation measure, or whatever Senators may be pleased to call it, is not a major relief measure; we never considered it as such; but, Mr. President, there are two important thoughts in connection with it that I should like to lodge in the minds of those who are criticizing and denouncing.

First, the forests of this country have been disappearing very rapidly, and the conservation of tree life is an important purpose. It may not be necessary to Arkansas; it may not be indispensable to some other particular locality; but, considered as a general, national measure, it is of primary importance. No language can portray the disastrous results that are to be expected if we permit our forests to be exhausted or destroyed.

The second thought is that, even though members of the conservation corps are not to be paid union wages, even though they are merely given subsistence, shelter, clothing, and something like $1 per day, it is far better to have your boy, far better for a citizen who cannot secure employment to have the opportunities that are afforded in those camps than that he shall be idle and dependent upon charity for the food and the clothing necessary to sustain him. Senators might wait a day or two, they might wait a week or two in order to see what will be the result of the measure.

I think any man who is President of the United States is entitled to the sympathetic cooperation not only from his party associates but also from every patriot in this broad land. If anyone believes that the President has not worked faithfully, and worked under great difficulties, let him acquaint himself with the facts.

I doubt if there is another man living, whatever his age or his experience, who has given more whole-heartedly of his life, his strength, his brain, his thought to the public service than Franklin D. Roosevelt has given since he became President on the 4th of March. Frequent, almost continuous, conferences have been held; many subjects have been dealt with; he has worked late at night and risen early in the morning. He may have made mistakes, but he has done a wonderful work, is doing a wonderful work. For God's sake, let us uphold his hands and give him a full measure of encouragement and assistance.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate any great length of time by anything I may say with reference to the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas. I think perhaps he did not understand me aright in reference to the letter which I read into the RECORD. I did not criticize the President in any of my remarks. I read a letter from a prominent business man in Indiana which undertook to criticize nobody in particular, but which did criticize very severely and very seriously the policy which we are following at the present time, a policy of deflation.

I did say that I agreed with much that had been said by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. I repeat now that I do agree with very much that he said. But, Mr. President, since the Senator from Arkansas has insisted on drawing me into a controversy which he evidently has with the Senator from Louisiana and to which controversy I insist on remaining an innocent bystander——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I correct the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Very well.

Mr. LONG. I took up the controversy where the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] left off. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] did not see fit to mention the Senator from South Carolina. I merely undertook to repeat and to exemplify the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina. There is no controversy between myself and the Senator from Arkansas, but I am opposed to party leadership coming from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not now nor do I intend hereafter to permit personal expressions to enter into the debate. I hope the Senator understands that however ardently I speak I am not angry.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understand that perfectly well, and that is why I was surprised that the Senator from Arkansas drew me into his controversy with the Senator from Louisiana, since I had said nothing in the matter at all in criticism of the President of the United States. But now that I am drawn into it permit me to say that, in my opinion, and I think time will vindicate my judgment, the so-called economy bill passed by the Congress of the United States of America at the instance of President Roosevelt was the cruelest, the most inhumane measure ever enacted into law by the Congress. Men who fought for their country in action are being deprived of the vested rights which the Congress had given them. Much was said about those who had never seen action. I claim the country should show its gratitude to all who are willing to die for its flag, whether they were called upon to give up their lives or not. All are entitled to grateful consideration, whether they served here or abroad.

But I point out to the Senator from Arkansas and to the Senate that hundreds and hundreds, thousands and thousands who actually saw action, who were injured in action, whose injuries are directly connected with action, are being deprived of benefits under the dictatorial regulations of the President which this Congress empowered him to draft. Look at your mail, Senators. Go back home and look into the faces of the veterans of wars of the Nation, to whom you owe your existence and the country owes its existence. Tell them what you have done to them. True, you took $400,000,000 out of their pockets, robbed them of that much purchasing power in this time when God knows we need all the purchasing power we can get to save the Nation from ruin. It is true that you have driven men, women, and children into their graves as the result. I am glad their blood is not on my hands.

The communications I have received since that infamous bill was enacted into law show me conclusively that men, women, and children are worrying themselves into their graves. God knows how they will live. They do not know how they are going to exist, since untold thousands of them were existing on the small benefits they had received from what they had assumed was a grateful Government. Go back home and tell them what a great act that was which you passed.

Tell them, Senators, what a wonderful thing President Roosevelt did for the country when he took away from them their vested rights. Explain to them how almost the very next day you voted for a measure that would start other men to planting trees at a dollar a day, with practically the very money that you had taken out of the pockets of the veterans of the country. Explain it all to them and listen for the applause. You will listen in vain.

Explain also to the building trades of the country and all those engaged in them, trying to uphold the American standard of living, trying to uphold the system of wages in this country, why you diverted $148,000,000 from building projects upon which the Congress of the United States had decided, and turned it over to other men at a dollar a day for planting trees—regimenting labor in the country which will result, and there can be no other result, in reducing the wages of the country and the standard of living.

Tell them also that this $148,000,000 diverted from the building projects will only last until May 1, and it is almost the first of May now. Tell them that it will require another $500,000,000 between now and next January 1 to carry on this reforestation scheme, against which I was happy to vote.

Explain to the veterans of America and to the Government workers all over the Nation from whom you took another $125,000,000 that you have turned that money right over to another class of citizens, able-bodied men. True, they are needy; but you robbed the sick and the halt and the blind to pay a dollar a day to 250,000 men to be regimented in camps very much as men are regimented in Russia.

Mr. President, I hope tomorrow, as soon as the Senate convenes or as soon thereafter as I may secure recognition, to speak briefly on the situation in Russia, now that the propaganda has become so urgent that this Government recognize the Soviet Republics.

Tell your folks back home what you did. Look into their appealing eyes, their eyes that will appeal to you in the midst of starvation, hunger, want, and need of every description. Tell them and their women and children that you took the food out of their mouths, that you took the money out of their pockets. Explain to them and hear how they applaud. It is true I voted for a relief fund of $500,000,000. What else could I do? You had just taken $500,000,000 from the veterans and now you undertake to boast about it. Of course, I voted for a relief fund of $500,000,000. I am glad I did. This country must take care of those who are in need.

Mr. President, other measures have been presented here by the President. I have referred to the bank bill and the moratorium, which I shall not discuss further now. Suffice it to say that it has deflated the depositors of America to the extent of $10,000,000,000. That is $10,000,000,000 less purchasing power we have today than we had on March 4. We have got to turn around and go the other way. I have been saying that from the beginning and today I was able to support it by a firm statement along the same line from one of the most prominent business men in the country.

Mr. President, I do not care to say more. I did not expect to say anything. I have no part in this controversy between the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Louisiana, but since I am drawn into it I am bound to speak my mind.

Mr. LONG and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator from Idaho desire to address the Senate?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I desire to submit a few remarks.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator permit me to make just a brief statement before he proceeds?

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. LONG. I merely wish to make a brief reply to what my friend the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has said. The Senator from Arkansas interprets what I have said to be a criticism of the President of the United States. I am not sure but what the Senator from Arkansas is right about that. I did not intend to criticize the President of the United States, but I believe that what I have said can only be interpreted—I want to be fair with my friend from Arkansas—as a criticism of the President in this respect.

I have pointed out our party platform. I have pointed out the President's promise based on that platform. I have pointed out, reinforced by the statement of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], that as to our promise to shorten working hours we have balked at least in that respect, or at least we have failed to act. That might be interpreted, when the remarks of the Senator from Illinois are taken in connection with it, as a criticism. If it is, I cannot help it.

There is one further thing I wish to say, Mr. President. I cannot be criticized for having said anything except what the President himself has said. Here is what he said:

> Our basic trouble was not an insufficiency of capital. It was an insufficiency of distribution of buying power.

That is what our President said in Atlanta, Ga. That is not all. I read some more from what our President said. He says:

> The unfeeling statistics of the past 3 decades show that the independent business man is running a losing race. Perhaps he is forced to the wall; perhaps he cannot command credit; perhaps he is "squeezed out" in Mr. Wilson's words, by highly organized corporate competitors, as your corner-grocery man can tell you.
> Recently a careful study was made of the concentration of business in the United States.
> It showed that our economic life was dominated by six hundred and odd corporations, who controlled two thirds of American industry. Ten million small business men divided the other third.
>
> More striking still, it appeared that, if the process of concentration goes on at the same rate, at the end of another century we shall have all American industry controlled by a dozen corporations and run by perhaps a hundred men.

Mr. LEWIS rose.

Mr. LONG. I am quoting now from the President of the United States. Does the Senator wish me to yield for a question or for a confession?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rise to call the attention of the able Senator from Louisiana to the fact that his observation just this moment is likely to lead to misunderstanding.

When the Senator had said in his address that this measure known as the "30 hour bill" or the "Black bill" was that of the President, and inquired why should he not, then, make some efforts to carry it through and press it to a conclusion, I rose and reminded the Senator that there was nothing in the record anywhere to show that this measure was the measure of the President; and I now again call the able Senator's attention to the fact that one may be for a principle and yet not be for the kind of measure that is brought in, which professes to carry out the principle.

That was the observation I beg to call to the attention of the Senator—that there was nothing to disclose and nowhere was there a charge that the particular form of measure here was the measure of the President. The measure was brought in through the able efforts, the assiduous industry, of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. It passed the Judiciary Committee, and found its way on the floor to meet the usual advocacy or opposition of Senators, according to their convictions as to the bill's constitutionality and its propriety. Nothing further was disclosed in the debate as to the President's attitude with regard to it.

Mr. LONG. I wish to say that I understood the Senator from Illinois, and I now understand him, that one can be for a principle and against any bill that puts the principle into effect. That had been previously stated here, however, on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I may add that it worries me a bit to see the eminent Senator, with his acute intellect, make an acrobatic performance of contradictions that would disclose either one of two things—that he either did not understand a common proposition of ordinary good sense, which I cannot have charged to him, or that he purposely distorts it for whatever purpose would serve its object, of which it seems to me he ought to be acquitted.

I therefore ask his permission to call attention again to the fact that a person may be for a principle and yet may not find in a measure tendered by someone that the principle is really expressed in that particular measure.

Mr. LONG. I understand the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator's statement gives me a sense of great relief.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I lack an understanding of the niceties of senatorial dictum in many respects. I now think, if I may restate the proposition, that one may be for shorter hours but not for a bill that is putting those shorter hours into effect. That is the sawmill understanding that I have of the Senator's language.

Now, perhaps I do not get it straight, but the facts are that we have promised the people shorter hours in the day, and fewer days in the week, and the bill is here. It is the judgment of the Democrats of the Senate and of the United States Senate itself that we have concocted a bill to put that promise into effect. It has not received the support of the administration; I do not know why; but I was simply undertaking, in passing, in the ludicrous way which I have, to assert what I understand to be the passing events of senatorial concourse. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I be permitted by the Senator from Louisiana to ask, in the language of the pleadings which are known to the profession of law, if he would make more specific and definite his use of the word "concourse"—whether he referred to the measure or to the Senator from Louisiana? [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. The fact remains, Mr. President, that it is time we knew what is going to happen. Are we going to take up this bill, the principle of which has been promised to the people, or are we going to allow this bill to stay here without final action?

I want to pass from that now. I do not want to have the impression imposed upon me further as to my own insufficiency in a colloquy with the Senator from Illinois. I am trying to read language and give my interpretation of it the best I know how.

The next point about which my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is in error is this: I took up the banner of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who made a speech here deploring the fact that we had not been able, or we had not seen fit, or by some means we had not done anything to put purchasing power in the hands of the masses. I understood the Senator from South Carolina to say that we had made ourselves ridiculous, with too much to eat and too much to wear, by allowing the people of this country to starve to death in this kind of a condition. I understood the Senator from South Carolina, who is one of the deans of the Senate, to have said that here, in the midst of plenty, we were quibbling and going counter to the absolute necessity of expanding the purchasing power and the currency in such a way that the masses might enjoy the wealth that is here in the land. If I did not correctly understand the Senator from South Carolina, I pause to be corrected by him.

Mr. SMITH. You did.

Mr. LONG. The Senator says I did.

Mr. President, I am not criticizing the President except insofar as the Senator from Arkansas may show it to be a criticism; but I tell you that when the President of the United States goes forward over the front-line trenches, armed with the accoutrements and the weapons that are necessary to fling starvation from the faces of the masses, to do away with destitution, and to do away with the terrible paralysis today which is causing the people to suffer worse than though we had famine, he cannot go forward with the old weapons that brought about this disaster and expect an improvement.

How is the President going to go along here with this old Federal Reserve outfit and expect to do anything with it in the future? I pause for the Senator from Arkansas to tell me how. How is he going to go along here with Eugene Meyer, and that Federal Reserve Board, and a clique that has come out of the offices of Morgan & Co., headed by Parker Gilbert, sitting here over the financial destiny of this administration, if that is the clique that brought us into the condition in which we now find ourselves?

I am undertaking to advise the President, perhaps not to my own interest. That does not make any difference. I am not worried a bit about that. I think the Senator from Arkansas will admit that I have gone half way in trying to vote for things here, the validity of which I doubted seriously; and I want to say to the credit of the Senator from Arkansas that I think he has extended his conscience in that direction just as far as it is possible for good legislative counsel to do. He deserves that compliment as much as I do. I did not get it from him. But you cannot make sense out of a proposition that you have to take $500,000,000 away from underpaid people and starving people in order to get $800,000,000 more.

I did say that we in Louisiana did not care anything about one of these sapling-planting bills. We do not need the saplings. The saplings will not help us any. What we need is some place to sell our products.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I wish to say that I would not have it thought for a moment that I would recant or retract a single word that I have said here today. "Someone must speak the truth to the king in the presence of the people. Somebody must speak the truth to the people in the presence of the king." I know I have spoken the truth here today, because I have spoken the facts as laid down by the President of the United States himself and by the Democratic platform.

I know I have warned of what the President is sitting among. I know how the people of this country are situated today, Mr. President. You cannot tell me that there is an improvement since March 3 with more than 150,000 more men out of work now than there were on the 3d day of March. You can argue all you please, and you are entitled to your opinion and your conviction; but when anybody tells you that things are getting better when 200,000 more men have no jobs today than had them a month ago, there is not any way to tell me that. There is not any way of telling me that things are getting better when the veteran of the Spanish-American War or the World War who was eking out some kind of an existence, and here and there helping some brother or sister or son or daughter from the little pittance that he was getting from the Government has had that taken away from him. You may tell me that that is bettering conditions, but I do not believe it, and I do not believe anybody else with any kind of legislative discretion believes that.

Mr. President, I hope we will make some effort to better conditions. I voted for the Wagner bill that the Senator mentions—yes. I voted for the Wagner bill under the Hoover administration. I voted for any kind of legislation which would consciously and properly put men to work. I would vote for more legislation of that kind; but, Mr. President, in a few words, here is all the President of the United States and the Senate and Congress have to do: All in the world we have to do is to put purchasing power into the hands of the masses.

"Expand the currency" was the promise. That is the expectation. We are not expanding the currency. We are deflating. We are not opening up banks for the distribution of capital and for the extension of credit. We are in the business of closing banks; and I have been privately informed—I may be in error as to this information, but I have been told—that even on this date the proposed bank bill, to which we were to be supplied with an introduction some time during the day, has been brought to a sudden halt, due to advices that have come from the same realm of financial spiritualism that has dictated our past actions in this body and the body at the other end of the Capitol.

So, Mr. President, hope is growing dim. It has gone glimmering. We are not going along the lines necessary to open up this country; and why sit here and argue with ourselves?

I was a political friend of the President-elect before some of my critics were. I helped nominate him when some of my critics were not doing anything of the kind. I did all I could. When I came to this body I was one of the few who did not think Franklin D. Roosevelt was the man to nominate for President of the United States, and I want to say to the credit of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that I soon came to the conclusion that they were right and I was wrong, and I became a sincere admirer of the principles enunciated by Franklin D. Roosevelt. I did not confine my activities in behalf of the nomination of Mr. Roosevelt to the State of Louisiana by any means, Mr. President. There are governors of other States, I think, who will verify whether or not I undertook to go into other States and to assist in the nomination of Mr. Roosevelt; and I did not do it because I wanted patronage from Mr. Roosevelt, nor because I liked the man, or thought he was working night and day. I did it because his pronouncements for the decentralization of wealth, and the shortening of the hours of labor, and the expansion of the purchasing power into the hands of the masses gave hope for this country. That is why we went out and undertook to nominate and to elect Franklin D. Roosevelt President of the United States; and I gave the President a chance not to have me go into North or South Dakota or Kansas or Nebraska.

Long after his nomination I waited, until our candidate of the Democratic Party come out again and reaffirmed his pledge and the platform pledge that he was in favor of decentralizing wealth and shortening hours and putting purchasing power into the hands of the masses. I am not disclosing any confidence when I say that I said to the President in his own home, "Do not let me go to the Dakotas or to Kansas or to Nebraska and tell the people there that we are going to shorten these hours and decentralize this wealth unless we are going to do it." I remade those promises in no more glowing terms than those in which they were made by the candidate himself.

Mr. President, are we to continue along the lines of deflation, concentration, closing of banks, taking purchasing power from the masses, impoverishing the soldiers, starving the common class, and eradicating every hope and every vestige of hope that can come by retaining these invisible influences, who have now become visible, which were invisible and criticized at one time? The only difference between such things as the Parker Gilbert influence under the Hoover administration and the same influence today was that under the Hoover administration it was referred to as an invisible power, and today it is boldly and openly asserted, and is visible in the concoction and passage of legislation dealing with the finances and currency and the purchasing power of the American people.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I shall defer discussing the matter which I had intended to discuss, but I take a moment to suggest that we have before us the farm relief bill. It seems to me that we are losing interest in it, and in all probability are willing that it should be put aside, not technically, but through discussion of other matters. There are provisions in the bill in which the Senate has little faith. I suspect a majority of the Senate would like to see these provisions rejected.

Mr. President, we are going to pass this particular farm relief bill. There are provisions in it which, if they stood alone, I should not vote for. But this particular bill is going to pass the Senate, and the more speedily it is passed the better it will be for a great many people who are interested in this relief measure.

There is one provision in the bill, with reference to the refinancing of the farm indebtedness of the United States, which seems to me of very great moment. I think it will carry immediate, specific, concrete relief to thousands and thousands of farmers of the United States who are seriously in debt. That portion of the bill alone ought to lead us to a speedy disposal of the measure. The other things will follow, and we may discuss them for a week or for a month, but in the end they will be a part of the bill which is passed. The bill should be changed, but it is not going to be changed for reasons it is not necessary to discuss.

I urge, if I may do so, that we dispose of this farm-relief measure tomorrow. It has been suggested that three other measures are to be brought up tomorrow. If they are brought up, another day will pass, and perhaps 2 days will pass, before the farm bill will again be considered, and it will be here for an interminable length of time. I want to call attention to the fact that in the meantime hundreds and thousands of farmers are daily coming closer, if not actually, to the loss of their homes. The only hope they have out of the pending bill is the refinancing portion of it. The other part, even if ultimately successful, will not bring immediate relief. Conceding that it may bring ultimate relief, it will not bring immediate relief; but the refinancing portion of the bill will bring immediate relief. Immediate relief means the saving of the homes and the farms of a great many farmers throughout the United States.

Mr. President, I trust that my friend the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], who wants to talk about Russia, which would be a great temptation for others, and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], who is interested in his 5-day week bill and the measure with reference to the censorship, as it is called, may be put aside, and permitted to remain aside until we dispose of the farm relief bill.

I want the refinancing proposition of the bill enacted into law as soon as it may be. I shall vote for the other portion of the bill, but only because it is a part of the measure.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator think that if the refinancing section stood by itself, we could pass it before 6 o'clock tonight? Everybody with whom I have talked is in favor of that part of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. I do think that; but I know, if the Senator from Pennsylvania will permit me to say so, that that is impossible. There are those who are interested in the other features of the bill who are unwilling to separate the refinancing proposition from the other portion of the bill. I should like very much myself to see that done. I would vote for it, and then be relieved from voting for that portion of the bill which I fear will not prove practicable. But we are not going to have that opportunity. When we vote upon the refinancing feature we are also going to be compelled to vote on the allotment plan, and we are going to vote on the other portions of the bill. Therefore, it seems to me that we should proceed without further discussion in the matter and pass the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may the committee amendment be stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 13, line 14, under the subhead "Miscellaneous", after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title"; and in line 21, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", so as to read:

SEC. 10. (a) The Secretary of Agriculture may appoint such officers and employees, subject to the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923 and acts amendatory thereof, and such experts as are necessary to execute the functions vested in him by this title; and the Secretary may make such appointments without regard to the Civil-Service laws or regulations: Provided, That no salary in excess of $10,000 per annum shall be paid to any officer, employee, or expert of the emergency agricultural-adjustment administration, which the Secretary shall establish in the Department of Agriculture for the administration of the functions vested in him by this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 24, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title"; and on page 14, line 1, after the word "permit", to insert "processors and", so as to read:

(b) The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to establish, for the more effective administration of the functions vested in him by this title, State and local committees, or associations of producers, and to permit processors and cooperative associations of producers, when in his judgment they are qualified to do so, to act as agents of their members and patrons in connection with the distribution of rental or benefit payments.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 9, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", so as to read:

(c) The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, with the approval of the President, to make such regulations with the force and effect of law as may be necessary to carry out the powers vested in him by this title. Any violation of any regulation shall be subject to such penalty, not in excess of $100, as may be provided therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 14, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title"; in line 17, after the word "imposed", to insert "or refunds to be made"; and in line 18, after the word "thereto", to strike out the comma and "and defining processing with respect to any commodity", so as to read:

(d) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the powers vested in him by this title, including regulations, with the force and effect of law establishing conversion factors for any commodity and article processed therefrom to determine the amount of tax imposed or refunds to be made with respect thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 1, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", and in line 3, after the name "American Samoa", to insert "the Canal Zone", so as to read:

(f) The provisions of this title shall be applicable to the United States and its possessions, except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, the Canal Zone, and the island of Guam.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 6, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", and in line 8, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", so as to read:

(g) No person shall, while acting in any official capacity in the administration of this title, speculate, directly or indirectly, in any agricultural commodity or product thereof, to which this title applies, or in contracts relating thereto, or in the stock or membership interests of any association or corporation engaged in handling, processing, or disposing of any such commodity or product. Any person violating this subsection shall upon conviction thereof be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 14, to insert:

(h) For the efficient administration of the provisions of part 2 of this title, the provisions, including penalties, of sections 8, 9, and 10 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, approved September 26, 1914, are made applicable to the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of the Secretary in administering the provisions of this title and to any person subject to the provisions of this title, whether or not a corporation. Hearings authorized or required under this title shall be conducted by the Secretary of Agriculture or such officer or employee of the Department as he may designate for the purpose. The Secretary may report any violation of any agreement entered into under part 2 of this title to the Attorney General of the United States, who shall cause appropriate proceedings to enforce such agreement to be commenced and prosecuted in the proper courts of the United States without delay.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I should like to invite the attention of the chairman of the committee to the amendment on page 15, beginning with line 15. That amendment would transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture, so far as the bill would be affected, the functions of the Federal Trade Commission, and it would write into the law sections 8, 9, and 10 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Those sections include the power of investigation, with a penalty attached.

There are two questions in my mind. One is, Why should we put into the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture the function of a commission which is already created, with all the machinery necessary to make investigations? That is the first question. Why should we duplicate?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in answer to that question I may say that it was thought by the committee and by those who drafted the bill that as this measure pertained to agricultural products much time could be saved during the short life of the measure by having the power granted by the Secretary of Agriculture to expedite matters, so that questions might be determined by him rather than go through the machinery, indirectly, of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I think the power is objectionable, not alone because of the necessity of building up machinery which already is instituted in the Federal Trade Commission, but I fear that, time being the essence and the desire being for quick action, in all probability the time necessary to make adequate investigation will not be given.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, of course, those on the committee know more about the matter than I do, but as I understand this provision it would give the Secretary of Agriculture the use of the Federal Trade Commission in these three particulars.

Mr. SMITH. No; the Senator is wrong. It would give him the same power included in the sections referred to here in order to expedite the administration, because the language is:

For the efficient administration of the provisions of part 2 of this title, the provisions, including penalties, of sections 8, 9, and 10 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, approved September 26, 1914, are made applicable to the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of the Secretary in administering the provisions of this title.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I see that by subsequent statement in line 22 the Secretary is authorized and directed to hold hearings. So the Senator is correct about it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Secretary would have the power under the Federal Trade Commission Act to fix a penalty of from $1,000 to $5,000, and it appears to me that it is an unusual delegation of power to an individual. In the first place, the Federal Trade Commission has all the machinery necessary; there is no necessity of any further expenditure, and if we are to assume that the investigation is not such as to justify the matter being referred to the Federal Trade Commission, but the power can be exercised through the Secretary of Agriculture, it does not look like a fair deal to a person who is haled before the Secretary of Agriculture for a violation of law.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I call the attention of the Senator to this fact, which I think will be persuasive, that all the matters arising under this bill will be better known and more thoroughly comprehended by the Secretary of Agriculture and his forces than they could be supposed to be by the Federal Trade Commission, and, therefore, in order to expedite the workings of the proposed law, it was deemed wise to give the Secretary, for the life of the measure, the power proposed to be vested in him?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I think the Senator will agree with me that if the purpose is to enforce the will of the Secretary—and under the bill the Secretary has all authority—and to give him the power of the Federal Trade Commission in making the investigation, we are eliminating every feature of equity when a dispute arises, for the man who enforces the law is the one who is going to investigate the charge. If a provision more despotic than that can be made, I do not know what it would be.

Mr. SMITH. I think, of course, the committee were persuaded that the Secretary of Agriculture and his corps of helpers and administrators would necessarily be more intimately conversant with the circumstances involved in any dispute than could be the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. FESS. I agree with the Senator in that respect, but I think the Senator will agree with me that in a particular case of this kind, where the Secretary wants a thing done in accordance with his understanding of the law, he would hardly be an impartial judge of the violation of the law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. As the Senator and I both know, we have permitted many commissions to be clothed with the power to impose penalties, and the law has so provided, but I ask has the Senator ever known of a case where a commission has actually inflicted a penalty? I ask that question merely for the purpose of indicating that, in my judgment, while the Secretary is given the power to impose the penalty, there will be no penalties imposed, but that the power may be used without resort to penalties.

Mr. FESS. The Senator asks me for information. I am not sufficiently acquainted with what has taken place to say whether a penalty ever has been inflicted or not, but I know when we passed such laws we expected in case of any obvious violation that a penalty would be imposed. While I am in sympathy with the effort on the part of the committee to reach a final decision, we are going into such unusual fields in this particular legislation that I am getting dizzy about it.

Mr. SMITH. Well, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio will realize that this is a departure from almost any precedent we have. The whole bill, from start to finish, is an attempt by every method that we possibly can call into operation to bring about a more satisfactory condition in reference to agriculture. The Senator will recognize that in providing for the imposition of a tax extraordinary power is granted to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is right about that. It is not only an experiment, but there never has been any such legislative proposal offered in any parliamentary body of which I know.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. As the Senator knows, I have had prepared by my office force two tables dealing with the pre-war prices of the seven commodities embraced in this proposed legislation. In one table the pre-war prices are compared with prices in February 1933, and in the other with prices for March 1933. I am wondering if the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture would be interested in having these two tables printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH. I should be very glad to have that done, Mr. President. I have looked over the tables and I think they are worth while.

Mr. HATFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that these tables may be published in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HATFIELD. The following tabulation shows the pre-war average price for the seven commodities that are mentioned in the emergency farm aid bill (S. 507) and also the average price for March 15, 1933, with the exception of the price for rice and tobacco, which is for February 1932.

The third column shows the increase that would have to be made in the price as given for March 15, 1933, in order to bring it to the pre-war average.

Prices as here mentioned refer to the price received by producers at local farm markets and are based on reports to the Division of Crop and Livestock Estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

The pre-war price is the price for the 5-year average from August 1909 to July 1914.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment beginning on page 15, line 15.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the subhead "Commodities", on page 16, line 7, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title"; in line 8, before the word "corn", to insert "field"; in line 9, before the word "rice", to strike out "cattle, sheep,"; in line 12, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", and in line 17, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. As used in this title, the term "basic agricultural commodity" means wheat, cotton, field corn, hogs, rice, tobacco, and milk and its products, and any regional or market classification, type, or grade thereof; but the Secretary of Agriculture shall exclude from the operation of the provisions of this title, during any period, any such commodity or classification, type, or grade thereof if he finds, upon investigation at any time and after due notice and opportunity for hearing to interested parties, that the conditions of production, marketing, and consumption are such that during such period this title cannot be effectively administered to the end of effectuating the declared policy with respect to such commodity or classification, type, or grade thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Appropriation", on page 16, line 23, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title"; and on page 17, line 1, after the word "under", to strike out "this act" and insert "parts 1 and 2 of this title", so as to read:

SEC. 12. (a) The proceeds derived from taxes imposed under this title, or so much thereof as may be necessary, are hereby appropriated to be available to the Secretary of Agriculture for rental and benefit payments and administrative expenses, including refunds under parts 1 and 2 of this title, personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, contract stenographic reporting services, and printing and paper in addition to allotments under existing law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 9, after the word "advance", to insert a comma and "out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated", so as to read:

(b) The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury shall jointly estimate from time to time the amounts currently required for such payments and expenses, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall advance, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Secretary of Agriculture the amounts so estimated.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I want to ask the able Senator from South Carolina about section 2, to which this amendment relates. We are now dealing with a type of appropriations direct from the Treasury. One type covers the initial payment, as I understand, for rentals and benefits.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Those appropriations are recouped to the Treasury if the processing tax is sufficient, but not otherwise. Is not that correct?

Mr. SMITH. That is correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. There could be a deficit at that point?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The other type of appropriation which comes direct from the Treasury is for administrative expenses, so called. Has there been any estimate made as to what those administrative expenses may be?

Mr. SMITH. I think not. There have been certain suggestions made, but I think there have been no definite figures submitted, at least, there have not been any submitted to the committee.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Would it be unfair to say that the administration of the bill will require a corps of inquisitors and taxgatherers, touching every county in the United States and virtually touching every farm and every processing factory?

Mr. SMITH. In regard to that, it has been suggested, and I think stated as a fact, that the present force employed, including attachés and employees of the Agricultural Department in their various capacities, such as farm-extension work, the administration of crop-production funds, and also the field force, the R.F.C., will be utilized to do this work without additional expense so far as possible. There are counties, I understand, in which no such employees of the Government will be available.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator indicated that there have been some tentative estimates as to expenditures. May I inquire what those are?

Mr. SMITH. I do not recall what they are; I cannot honestly state.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment in line 9, on page 17.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 12, after the word "of", to insert the word "any", so as to read:

The amount of any such advance shall be deducted from such funds as subsequently become available under subsection (a).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 16, after the word "this", to strike out "section" and insert "title"; and in line 19, after the word "of", to strike out "this act" and insert "parts 1 and 2 of this title", so as to read:

(c) The Secretary of Agriculture shall transfer to the Treasury Department and is authorized to transfer to other agencies, out of funds available under this title, such sums as are required to pay administrative expenses incurred and refunds made by such department or agencies in the administration of parts 1 and 2 of this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Termination of act", on page 17, line 21, after the word "This", to strike out "act" and insert "title"; and on page 18, line 2, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", so as to read:

SEC. 13. This title shall cease to be in effect whenever the President finds and proclaims that the national economic emergency in relation to agriculture has been ended; and pending such time the President shall by proclamation terminate with respect to any basic agricultural commodity such provisions of this title as he finds are not requisite to carrying out the declared policy with respect to such commodity. The Secretary of Agriculture shall make such investigations and reports thereon to the President as may be necessary to aid him in executing this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Separability of provisions", on page 18, line 8, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title"; and in line 11, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", so as to read:

SEC. 14. If any provision of this title is declared unconstitutional, or the applicability thereof to any person, circumstance, or commodity is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of this title and the applicability thereof to other persons, circumstances, or commodities shall not be affected thereby.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Supplementary revenue provisions, exemptions, and compensating taxes", on page 19, after line 5, to strike out:

(b) No tax shall be required to be paid on the processing of any commodity by the producer thereof on his own premises for consumption of his own family, employees, or household; and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, by regulations, to exempt producers from the payment of the processing tax with respect to hogs, cattle, sheep, or milk and its products in cases where the producer's sales of the products resulting from the processing of the commodity do not exceed $100 per annum.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

(b) The Secretary of Agriculture may provide by regulations for exemption from the tax of commodities processed by the producer thereof or processed for the producer.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, on page 17, line 24, in subdivision (b), there is a committee amendment. I probably may desire to offer an amendment to that, but that amendment would not be in order at this time, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment would not be in order until the committee amendments shall have been disposed of. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee beginning on line 6, page 19.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 19, line 20, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", and in line 22, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", so as to read:

(c) Any person delivering any product to any organization for charitable distribution or use shall, if such product or the commodity from which processed, is under this title subject to tax, be entitled to a refund of the amount of any tax paid under this title with respect to such product so delivered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 3, after the word "competing", to strike out "agricultural"; in line 10, after the word "competing", to strike out "agricultural"; in line 14, after the word "competing", to strike out "agricultural"; in line 19, after the word "competing", to strike out "agricultural"; in line 20, after the word "per," to strike out "like unit" and insert "equivalent unit, as determined by the Secretary"; and in line 20, after the word "commodity" and the period, to strike out "The term 'competing agricultural commodity' shall include, among others, rayon, silk, linen, and oleomargarine, and any basic agricultural commodity as to which a tax is not in effect under section 9", so as to read:

(d) The Secretary of Agriculture shall ascertain from time to time whether the payment of the processing tax upon any basic agricultural commodity is causing or will cause to the processors thereof disadvantages in competition from competing commodities by reason of excessive shifts in consumption between such commodities or products thereof. If the Secretary of Agriculture finds, after investigation and due notice and opportunity for hearing to interested parties, that such disadvantages in competition exist, or will exist, he shall proclaim such finding. The Secretary shall specify in this proclamation the competing commodity and the compensating rate of tax on the processing thereof necessary to prevent such disadvantages in competition. Thereafter there shall be levied, assessed, and collected upon the first domestic processing of such competing commodity a tax, to be paid by the processor, at the rate specified, until such rate is altered pursuant to a further finding under this section, or the tax or rate thereof on the basic agricultural commodity is altered or terminated. In no case shall the tax imposed upon such competing commodity exceed that imposed per equivalent unit, as determined by the Secretary, upon the basic agricultural commodity.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 6, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title"; and in line 7, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", so as to read:

(e) During any period for which a processing tax is in effect with respect to any commodity there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon any article processed or manufactured wholly or in chief value from such commodity and imported into the United States or any possession thereof to which this title applies, from any foreign country or from any possession of the United States to which this title does not apply, a compensating tax equal to the amount of the processing tax in effect with respect to domestic processing at the time of importation. Such tax shall be paid prior to the release of the article from customs custody or control.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Floor stocks", on page 22, after line 13, to insert:

(c) For the purposes of this section the term "retail trade" shall not be held to include the business of an establishment which is owned, operated, maintained, or controlled by the same individual, firm, corporation, or association that owns, operates, maintains, or controls any more than two other establishments of the same character.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Exportations", on page 22, line 25, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title"; and on page 23, line 2, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", so as to read:

SEC. 17. (a) Upon the exportation to any foreign country (including the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, and the island of Guam) of any product with respect to which a tax has been paid under this title, or of any product processed wholly or in chief value from a commodity with respect to which a tax has been paid under this title, the exporter thereof shall be entitled at the time of exportation to a refund of the amount of such tax.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 7, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title"; and in line 10, after the word "this.", to strike out "act" and insert "title", so as to read:

(b) Upon the giving of bond satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury for the faithful observance of the provisions of this title requiring the payment of taxes, any person shall be entitled, without payment of the tax, to process for such exportation any commodity with respect to which a tax is imposed by this title, or to hold for such exportation any article processed wholly or in chief value therefrom.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Existing contracts", on page 23, line 14, after "Sec. 18. (a)", to strike out "If (1) any processor, jobber, or wholesaler has, prior to the date of approval of this act, made a bona-fide contract of sale for delivery after such date of any article in respect of which a tax is imposed under this act" and in lieu thereof to insert "If (1) any processor, jobber, or wholesaler has, prior to the date a tax with respect to any commodity is first imposed under this title, made a bona-fide contract of sale for delivery after such date, of any article processed wholly or in chief value from such commodity."

So as to read:

SEC. 18. (a) If (1) any processor, jobber, or wholesaler has, prior to the date a tax with respect to any commodity is first imposed under this title, made a bona-fide contract of sale for delivery after such date, of any article processed wholly or in chief value from such commodity, and if (2) such contract does not permit the addition to the amount to be paid thereunder of the whole of such tax, then (unless the contract prohibits such addition) the vendee shall pay so much of the tax as is not permitted to be added to the contract price.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 6, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", so as to read:

(b) Taxes payable by the vendee shall be paid to the vendor at the time the sale is consummated and shall be collected and paid to the United States by the vendor in the same manner as other taxes under this title. In case of failure or refusal by the vendee to pay such taxes to the vendor, the vendor shall report the facts to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue who shall cause collections of such taxes to be made from the vendee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Collection of taxes", on page 24, line 12, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", so as to read:

SEC. 19. (a) The taxes provided in this title shall be collected by the Bureau of Internal Revenue under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such taxes shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 20, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", and in line 21, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", so as to read:

(b) All provisions of law, including penalties, applicable with respect to the taxes imposed by section 600 of the Revenue Act of 1926, and the provisions of section 626 of the Revenue Act of 1932, shall, insofar as applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions of this title, be applicable in respect of taxes imposed by this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 23, after the word "exceeding", to strike out "60" and insert "90", and in line 25, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to permit postponement, for a period not exceeding 90 days, of the payment of taxes covered by any return under this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 1, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title"; in line 3, after the word "processors", to insert "or distributors", and in the same line, after the word "processor", to insert "or distributor", so as to read:

(c) In order that the payment of taxes under this title may not impose any immediate undue financial burden upon processors or distributors, any processor or distributor subject to such taxes shall be eligible for loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, after line 6, to insert:

PART 3—COST OF PRODUCTION

SEC. 20. (a) The Secretary of Agriculture, in addition to the powers granted by parts 2 and 3 of this title is hereby authorized, with respect to any basic agricultural commodity, to estimate as nearly as practicable and proclaim from time to time—

(1) The percentage of the domestic production of the commodity, including carry-over stocks, for market during the next marketing period for the commodity, that will be needed for domestic consumption; and

(2) The average domestic cost of production for the commodity.

(b) After such date as shall be specified in the proclamation, it shall be unlawful for any person to purchase any amount of the commodity from the producer or any association of producers at a price, for the domestic consumption percentage thereof, that is less than the proclaimed cost of production for the commodity. The remainder may be purchased at such price as is agreed to by the parties; and shall be segregated for export, or for processing for export, in accordance with regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture.

(c) Any person violating the provisions of subsection (b) shall, upon conviction thereof, be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both, for each such violation.

(d) The provisions of section 15 (d) and (e) shall apply with respect to commodities or products thereof competing with, and imported articles processed or manufactured wholly or in chief value from, any basic agricultural commodity for which the cost of production has been proclaimed under this section, to the same extent as such provisions apply with respect to commodities or products thereof competing with, or imported articles processed or manufactured wholly or in chief value from, any commodity for which a processing tax is in effect.

(e) In order to carry out the provisions of this section the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to license persons engaged in the business of purchasing from producers or associations of producers any basic agricultural commodity with respect to which the Secretary has proclaimed the cost of production. Such licenses shall be subject to such terms and conditions as may be necessary effectively to execute the provisions of this section. Any person so engaged without a license as required by the Secretary under this section shall be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000 for each day the violation continues. The Secretary may suspend or revoke any such license, after due notice and opportunity for hearing, for any violation of this section or of the terms or conditions of the license.

Mr. McNARY. That is a wholly new part of the bill. It met with considerable controversy in the committee and will meet with some opposition on the floor. There are a number of Senators absent this evening, and I suggest to the able Senator who has the bill in charge that we take a recess at this time until tomorrow, when we may take up that amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to make a statement. We have now finished the bill so far as pertains to its farm-relief provisions as sent down by the Department. We have now reached that portion of the bill which was incorporated by the committee on its own initiative, namely, part 3, embodying the cost-of-production plan. Of course, Senators understand that that is a plan which, so far as the testimony before the committee indicates, a vast number of farmers prefer to either the processing tax or the leasing feature.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me inquire of the Senator if the cost-of-production plan as proposed is not optional?

Mr. SMITH. It is optional.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Secretary of Agriculture does not have to put it into operation.

Mr. SMITH. He does not have to do so.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the other provisions do not work, however, he can try the plan thus proposed?

Mr. SMITH. Yes. As I stated earlier today, there are three propositions embraced in the text of the bill. One is the leasing plan, another the allotment plan, and the third the cost-of-production plan. In order that the Senate may thoroughly understand, let me say that the cost-of-production plan does not have reference to all crops, but the principle will be applied upon that portion of crops domestically consumed, so that it comes very nearly being in the same category as the allotment plan. It simply is put in the bill as an alternative for the Secretary to use at his discretion. If for any reason he finds that the cost-of-production plan would be more acceptable and work out more to the benefit of the farmers than would the other plans, he has it here at his disposal. If he does not see fit to use it, of course he will not do so.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. As I understand this provision, if the Secretary of Agriculture finds as to any part of a certain crop used domestically that the cost of producing it amounts to a certain sum, even though my neighbor has produced such a crop he cannot sell it to me, although he wants to get rid of it and I want to buy it, for less than the Secretary claims is the cost of production of that crop in the United States.

Mr. SMITH. The same thing is true of the allotment plan. The tax fixed has got to be paid ultimately. The difference between the two is that under the crop-production plan the original buyer must pay the cost of production on that percentage of the crop that is domestically consumed.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, under this provision the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to proclaim a situation which will result in the application of a criminal statute to any man who buys from the producer for less than the price fixed by the Secretary any portion of a domestically consumed commodity, notwithstanding the fact that the producer is willing to take a price that may be less than that fixed by the Secretary and the purchaser is willing to buy? If the Senator is going to punish me for buying from him, why not punish him for selling to me, if this is to be a criminal statute?

Mr. SMITH. I think it would amount to the same thing. The Senator would be punished for offering me less than the production price, no matter what I might be willing to sell for, and he would be estopped from purchasing it except at the price proclaimed as being the cost of production.

Mr. BARKLEY. If I am a producer of tobacco and the Secretary of Agriculture proclaims that it costs me 5 cents a pound to produce it, then I could not sell the Senator a pound of it for 4 cents without violating the law and subjecting the Senator to a penalty of a thousand dollars a day?

Mr. SMITH. If I am the buyer, I must pay the cost of production. I suppose there will not be very many farmers who will endanger a man in a suit because he offered less. The farmer would always maintain that he should have the cost of production.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator think that this section is likely to offer any inducement for the purchase of farm products or will it not operate as a hindrance?

Mr. SMITH. The fact of the business is that the same argument may be used against the allotment plan. Is it going to restrict purchases? Under that plan, when the tax is fixed, the processor, who is the ultimate purchaser, has to pay the tax. Under the cost-of-production plan the purchaser has to pay the cost of production. In both instances, so far as the law is concerned, the price stands fixed and inflexible during the life of the tax or during the time the cost of production is fixed.

Mr. BARKLEY. With reference to commodities, of which there are various types, does the Senator think the Secretary of Agriculture could within reasonable bounds formulate any judgment as to the average cost of production so as to be able to apply it to each type and make it fair as an average among the different types of the same product, so as to work no injustice either to the producer or the purchaser?

Mr. SMITH. No one pretends to deny that there is going to be difficulty in the administration of the two features of the bill which look toward price fixing.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will allow me just a moment I will yield. In the case of wheat, under the allotment plan and the tax, there will be different grades of wheat. The Secretary will have to work out a plan by which the equity of the farmer will be maintained in the different grades of his wheat. The same thing is true of cotton, and it would be true under the allotment plan, as it would under the cost-of-production plan.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let us take wheat or corn or tobacco or rye, and let us suppose the Secretary of Agriculture has issued the proclamations. Let us suppose further that a given farmer has a thousand bushels of wheat and that in order to pay his taxes he must raise some money. We will assume the normal price of wheat may be below what the Secretary has proclaimed as the cost of production. Let us assume the farmer wants to raise money to pay his taxes or to pay off a mortgage or for any other emergent purpose, and that he must sell some wheat even though at a sacrifice. He cannot do it under this section because the purchaser will be penalized. He will be confronted with a situation where his crop will be in the barn or in the bin, where he needs money, but he cannot sell because nobody can buy without incurring the penalty. What will happen then?

Mr. SMITH. The same thing would be true there, except there is this difference. Under the cost-of-production plan the price is fixed. Under the allotment plan, if the Secretary found the tax levied was actually retarding the sale, he might lower the tax, but under the cost-of-production plan the price would be fixed.

Mr. BARKLEY. He cannot lower anything then?

Mr. SMITH. No; not under the cost-of-production plan. I yield now to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is manifest that the pending amendment cannot be disposed of this evening. Does the Senator expect to dispose of it today?

Mr. SMITH. I had hoped that we might make progress on the bill. I think the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has voiced what is the real sentiment of the Senate, but it is evident that the pending provision is going to lead to considerable discussion. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas, the leader on the Democratic side, if he proposes to ask for an adjournment or a recess?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think that it will be necessary to take a recess. I know that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] hopes for an adjournment; but in view of the discussions which have taken place and of the sentiment that has been expressed to me, I am going to suggest a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow. It will not be practicable to meet at 10 o'clock, for the reason that a number of committees are meeting at that hour in the morning and the chairmen of those committees have insisted that we meet at the usual hour.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to state to the Senator that a bill has been referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and I was asked, in order to expedite it, to call the committee together tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock. The bill is known as the Muscle Shoals bill. I have issued a call for that hour for a meeting of the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I find there are 5 or 6 committees of first importance which are meeting in the morning, and I do not believe it practicable to recess until 10 o'clock. I suggest, then, that we recess now, but before doing that I should like to have a brief executive session.

Mr. SMITH. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting the nomination of Harry L. Sexton, of Brownsville, Tex., to be collector of customs for customs collection district no. 23, with headquarters at San Antonio, Tex., in place of Roy Campbell, resigned, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably sundry nominations in the Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nominations will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. NORRIS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Joseph W. Woodrough, of Nebraska, to be United States circuit judge, eighth circuit, which was ordered to be placed on the Executive Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar is in order.

JULIAN L. SCHLEY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Julian L. Schley to be Governor of the Panama Canal Zone.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

CUSTOMS SERVICE

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Harry M. Durning to be collector of customs, customs collection district no. 10, New York, N.Y.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed. Without objection, the President will be notified of the nominations this day confirmed. That concludes the Executive Calendar.

The Senate resumed legislative business.

RECESS

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p.m.) took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, April 12, 1933, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATION

Executive nomination received by the Senate April 11, 1933

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS

Harry L. Sexton, of Brownsville, Tex., to be collector of customs for customs collection district no. 23, with headquarters at San Antonio, Tex., in place of Roy Campbell, resigned.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate April 11, 1933

GOVERNOR OF PANAMA CANAL

Julian L. Schley to be Governor of Panama Canal.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS

Harry M. Durning to be collector of customs, district no. 10, New York, N.Y.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, APRIL 11, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we rejoice that we are in a world where Thou dost reign. Thou art the fountain of mercy and dost bring light out of darkness and peace out of pain, and doeth all things well. May we accept it, our Heavenly Father, for larger service and for diviner joys in which our enfranchised souls shall share with those who walk with Thee. In all things that shall be done today may we hear Thy "Well done" and have the blessing of the heart that is undisturbed. Blessed Lord, crown us with minds that plan and ponder, with hearts that yearn and aspire; and may they be used for Thy glory and for our country's good, and Thine shall be the praise. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, may I make a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, there are several rules to be brought up this morning. Can the majority leader tell me in what order those rules are to be brought up?

Mr. BYRNS. There is only one rule to be taken up this morning, and that is the rule with reference to the post-office leases. After that the rule relative to the farm-mortgage loans will be taken up.

INVESTIGATION OF POST-OFFICE LEASES

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I call up the resolution (H.Res. 98) for immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 98

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to the consideration of House Resolution 59, and all points of order against said resolution shall be considered as waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the resolution and shall continue not to exceed 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution to its adoption or rejection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, this resolution makes in order the resolution extending the time for the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in the House with reference to the investigation that was authorized in the last session. The members of that committee were not able to complete their work, and this resolution simply authorizes them to proceed with their investigation.

I do not desire to take up any time of the House at this time.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SABATH. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman says the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has not been able to complete its investigation.

Mr. SABATH. That is correct.

Mr. SNELL. I had understood from general conversation, not official, that the investigation was all made, but this extension was for the purpose of completing the report to Congress. Is that correct or not?

Mr. SABATH. I understand that additional investigation is under consideration, but I do not suppose it will take a very long time to complete it.

Mr. SNELL. Is the chairman of the committee present?

Mr. SABATH. The chairman of the committee is present, and he will explain what they have done and what they desire to do in the future.

Mr. SNELL. I had understood it was just to give additional time for the purpose of compiling their report and making the report to Congress, but practically there was no more investigation to be made.

Mr. SABATH. It may be that one or two more witnesses will be called, if I am correctly informed.

I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] 5 minutes.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, this resolution from the Rules Committee, House Resolution 59, merely permits the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, as now constituted, to continue an investigation which was ordered in the Seventy-second Congress. In that Congress a resolution was approved authorizing our committee to investigate post-office contracts, leases, subsidies, and other postal expenditures, with the idea in mind of balancing the postal budget. The members of our committee have worked diligently for the past year, and we are prepared to recommend to Congress and to the Department, amongst other things, a new air mail policy. This policy will immediately save the Government $5,000,000, and within 5 years it will put the Air Mail Service on a paying basis. That is but one phase of the work in which we are engaged. We have taken up matters, pertaining to postage rates, and we are now prepared to recommend to the Post Office Department a return to 2-cent postage rates—we have the facts and figures to prove that such a change will be conducive to increased revenue. It will increase volume and reduce unit cost.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. My friend from New York has done some most valuable work. The gentleman speaks of making recommendations to the Department. Why not pass a law directing what should be changed? If the Department for several years has been doing unwise things which need changing by Congress, instead of making recommendations to the Department why does not the gentleman's committee have Congress pass a law that will direct the Department to make the proper changes?

Mr. MEAD. We are also making our report to the Congress, and we have already introduced legislation to bring about just what the gentleman desires.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to see it directory, that the postage on first-class mail shall be reduced from 3 cents to 2 cents. And postage should be reduced back to 2 cents immediately.

Mr. MEAD. I am in hearty accord with the gentleman's wishes, but, of course, we are meeting in what might be termed "an emergency session of Congress", and we are giving consideration to emergency recommendations from the administration. Therefore we are taking up our recommendations with the Congress and with the Department. We have made a very thorough investigation, and this resolution merely permits the present Post Office Committee, as it is now constituted, to continue the work which the former Post Office Committee carried on so well.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. WARREN. The gentleman from Illinois will recall that the House, by a roll-call vote at the last session, authorized an expenditure of $5,000 for this investigation. As I understand, it is now proposed to use the unexpended portion of this appropriation and that no other fund will be sought.

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman is correct. We are not asking for any additional appropriation, but merely for the authority to carry on our work and make our complete report to the Congress.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Can the gentleman enlighten us as to when the committee will be able to make this report and whether or not we will be able to reduce postage from 3 cents to 2 cents at this session?

Mr. MEAD. I may say to the gentleman that we have already made our report on the Air Mail Service. We are prepared to make our final report on the matter of reducing first-class postage from 3 cents to 2 cents, as the gentleman indicated, and I believe action will be taken in that connection in the very near future.

Mr. McFARLANE. Another question, in regard to the subsidy of newspapers, ranging from $35,000,000 to $40,000,000 a year, Has the gentleman's committee taken this matter into consideration?

Mr. MEAD. I may say to the gentleman that the cost-ascertainment commission's figures show the amount to be nearer $75,000,000 a year.

Mr. McFARLANE. I am talking about the daily newspapers.

Mr. MEAD. I am talking about second-class mail matter, which includes both newspapers and magazines. We took that into consideration in the last session of Congress. We passed a bill which increased the rates on second-class mail matter, and the committee may recommend further increases before we complete our work.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. How long does this resolution continue the life of this committee?

Mr. MEAD. It continues the committee throughout this Congress.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SNELL. About what time does the gentleman expect he will be able to make his complete report to the House?

Mr. MEAD. I may say to the gentleman from New York that we have practically completed our hearings. We have a voluminous record of hearings that require study.

Mr. SNELL. The hearings are practically completed?

Mr. MEAD. The hearings are practically completed, and as soon as we have time to digest them we will make our report to the House.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SABATH. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire any time?

Mr. RANSLEY. On this side of the aisle we have but one speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY]. We should like to yield him 10 minutes. He is the only gentleman to whom we will yield time on this question.

Mr. SABATH. How much time does he wish?

Mr. RANSLEY. Ten minutes.

Mr. SABATH. We have come to a tentative agreement that he would try to get through in 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I could use the entire time allotted in describing the constructive service that has been rendered in this investigation by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD], chairman of this committee. [Applause.]

As chairman, he has carefully watched the expenditures of this committee. He has been meticulous about every expense and has also seen to it that the committee kept to the problems involved. The report, when finally completed, will be a constructive one and will show how millions of dollars can be saved in the conduct of the Postal Service.

May I remind the House that the Post Office establishment is the biggest business under the control of this body, involving about $800,000,000 a year. The questions covered by the investigation are many. Most important are 3 or 4 phases involving millions of dollars. One is the leasing system now in force in the Post Office Department. Under general law nothing can be done as to ownership of buildings for branches, stations, and garages in the large cities. There is no provision by which these facilities can be purchased or constructed, yet they are absolutely essential to the conduct of the Post Office Establishment.

As a result of this forced leasing system millions of dollars have been spent in what might be termed an entirely unjustifiable expense. We went into the St. Paul lease where a long-term lease was entered into at the rate of $120,000 a year. It was carried on by several administrations. The entire appraised value of this building and site was $500,000. We have been paying as rent each year about 25 percent of the valuation of the property. Bonds totaling a million and a half dollars were sold to innocent investors who were told that the Government was back of the bond.

We investigated the Quincy Annex Station in Chicago. It was leased at $123,000 a year. The appraised valuation of this property is about $500,000. Under the law we could neither buy this building nor construct another one.

This committee went into these matters and has come to the conclusion that it would be an efficient and constructive measure to permit the Department to purchase or construct these buildings. We are now paying out every year about $7,500,000 for rentals for these structures, and we have nothing to show for the expenditure at the end of the long-term leases. We could capitalize at 4 percent an amount sufficient to build all of them and in 12 years pay off the bond issue and have the buildings in the possession of the Government of the United States. This would mean thereafter a savings of millions annually.

Another item of great importance is the Air Mail Service. This service has developed a great industry. It has trained pilots who can be used in national defense. It has rendered a great service to the public, but for several years it has been overdeveloped. As a result, in the last Congress the Senate completely eliminated the entire appropriation, which would have destroyed a great service. The gentleman from New York and myself appeared before the conferees by invitation and explained how it is possible to wipe out every cent of the subsidy of the air mail in 5 years' time and still retain a comprehensive service such as we have now, on a self-supporting basis.

Legislation is before this body, recommended in the report from the investigating committee covered by this resolution, which in itself will save millions of dollars and put the air mail on a basis where not a dollar will be paid to operators except from the revenues of the air mail postage itself.

There is another question that is intensely interesting, and that is the point raised by the gentleman as to postage rates.

The Post Office Committee has never had a chance to deal with this 3-cent rate for letters. We refused to recommend it, but it was passed as a tax measure, a 50 percent tax, making the letter rate 3 cents instead of 2 cents.

I am convinced from my study of it that this was a grievous blunder that should be corrected at the earliest possible moment by this Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is the gentleman prepared to say at this time that the committee will come in with a recommendation for the restoration of the 2-cent rate?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I feel certain the committee will be unanimously in favor of its restoration. We will lose in the present fiscal year, according to the calculation that can be made on volume, 5,000,000,000 letters out of the mail, largely as a result of the 3-cent rate. There is a reduction in revenue on first-class mail from $310,000,000 in 1932 down to a point where we can figure a loss of $52,000,000 as a result of this 3-cent rate. By restoring the 2-cent rate we can increase the volume and cut the unit cost until we will be in a position to help restore the lost revenue.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes. This is an important matter and the House is entitled to know what the committee has done.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. McFARLANE. Speaking in the capacity of a Democrat, may I ask the gentleman in regard to these leases of postal property whether he thinks we should cancel a lot of these expensive contracts and relet them under the Democratic administration?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. These expensive leases have been awarded in all administrations. We are recommending that all leases possible be put on a short-term basis until these recommendations can be carried out.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. What cost does the gentleman estimate is involved in the building program which the gentleman states the committee will favor?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The amount of the entire rental item is about $17,500,000 a year. This applies to all post-office buildings. In the item of branches, stations, and garages, which is the outstanding evil of the present time, $7,500,000 is involved every year.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. What would be the cost of constructing the buildings that the gentleman states the committee will recommend?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I believe that $80,000,000 would erect every one of these stations that now pays more than $3,000 a year, and they would be amortized in 12 years through the savings made.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And what would be the cost of maintaining these buildings.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The cost of maintenance is now carried just the same, and there would be no additional cost on that account.

Let me name a fourth problem which we have been dealing with—one of great importance. Besides the postage-rate reduction, the matter of air mail without subsidy, and these leases, which are wasting money every year, there is the matter of the subsidy for the merchant marine.

We have been going into this matter quite carefully and have found it a very difficult and complex problem. We believe that the amount of $21,000,000 a year for what is known as the ship subsidy can be reduced by at least one third, and that the $14,000,000, which was stated at the time of the passage of the act as being the utmost limit of these payments, ought to be put into force. We can deal with it on a fair basis, and by reducing the subsidy year by year, until the $14,000,000 is made the extreme cost, we can accomplish something in justifiable saving.

These various measures will save the Post Office Department millions of dollars.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I presume on this merchant marine subsidy the gentleman found some of these National Economy Leaguers, who were most anxious to penalize the veterans, are themselves recipients of hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes; we found that out in the course of our investigation.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Has the committee taken care of that situation?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Not directly, but all these things are under consideration by the committee.

Mr. Speaker, the Post Office Department has a reported deficit for the last year, 1932, of $152,000,000. We believe that the recommendations that we have made and will make from the committee, when enacted, will cut the deficit down substantially. Final elimination of the deficit can only be accomplished by increasing the volume of mail. It will never be done by increasing postage rates on the various classes that furnish so much of the mail.

The air mail rate has been increased from 5 cents to 8 cents and it has cut the volume 30 percent. The first-class rate has been increased to 3 cents, and it has cut the volume almost 40 percent. Every time we cut the volume by increasing the rate we add to the postal deficit.

If we had had the same revenue increase since 1929 that we had between 1921 and 1929, there would be a surplus of $19,000,000 instead of this deficit.

I hope the Members of the House will enable the committee to make its final report. The recommendation on air mail changes already made means $5,000,000 a year saving, and these other recommendations will add still more millions to the savings of the Government in the conduct of the biggest business under its control.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How much did we lose when we increased the rate on post cards from 1 cent to 2 cents? When we thought we were going to increase the postal revenues, how much did we decrease them by this action?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The Post Office Department told us that if we would make the rate on post cards 2 cents instead of 1 cent we would add $10,000,000 to the $10,000,000 we were then receiving. We took their estimate, and the next year they showed a loss of $6,000,000 out of the $10,000,000 that we were getting on the 1-cent rate. Such action is futile. Low postage rates and high mail volume is the true pathway to a self-sustaining postal service.

DEVELOPMENT OF THE TENNESSEE VALLEY

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for half a minute in order to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, the legislation concerning the development of the Tennessee Valley, including Muscle Shoals, has been introduced and hearings will be commenced at 2 o'clock today before the Committee on Military Affairs, and any Member of the House who desires an opportunity to appear either in support of or in opposition to the measure is invited to do so, because the hearings will be concluded at the end of the week.

INVESTIGATION OF POST-OFFICE LEASES

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report House Resolution 59.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 59

Resolved, That for the purpose of obtaining information necessary as a basis for legislation, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the Seventy-third Congress is authorized, as a committee, by subcommittee or otherwise, to continue the investigation begun under authority of House Resolution 226 of the Seventy-second Congress, and for such purposes said committee shall have the same power and authority as that conferred upon the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads by House Resolution 226 of the Seventy-second Congress. The unexpended balance of the appropriation of $5,000 under House Resolution 273 of the Seventy-second Congress is hereby continued for such purposes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I take it for granted that everyone who listened to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] are satisfied that a great deal has been accomplished, and believing that to be the case, I ask for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

EMERGENCY FARM MORTGAGE ACT OF 1933

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged resolution, House Resolution 103.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 4795, a bill to provide emergency relief with respect to agricultural indebtedness, to refinance farm mortgages at lower rates of interest, to amend and supplement the Federal Farm Loan Act, to provide for the orderly liquidation of joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 8 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture, the bill shall be considered as having been read for amendment. No amendments shall be in order to said bill except amendments offered by direction of the Committee on Agriculture and said amendments shall be in order any rule of the House to the contrary notwithstanding. Amendments offered by direction of the Committee on Agriculture may be offered to any section of the bill at the conclusion of the general debate, but said amendments shall not be subject to amendment. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Pending the consideration of the rule, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how much time is desired on that side.

Mr. RANSLEY. On this side we would like to have the full 30 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am very glad to yield to the gentleman 30 minutes.

Mr. RANSLEY. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the Rules Committee, in presenting this resolution, has no other desire except to facilitate the immediate passage of this act from the Agricultural Committee dealing with farm credits and loans, believing that an emergency exists and that it should be passed with as little delay as possible.

Some might interpret the resolution as being a tight rule, sometimes called a gag rule. But we must recognize that in this day of emergency great party responsibility rests with the Democratic Party. The President has proposed this emergency measure in order to get action, and to get it quickly. We feel that the House should pass this Federal Farm Loan Act in order that it can be gotten into operation at the soonest possible moment.

A desperate situation exists in the country in reference to farm mortgages and indebtedness. Mortgages are being foreclosed and homes taken away, and we recognize that this measure is one that will give the greatest amount of relief to the farmers who are in debt on their homes and are threatened with foreclosure proceedings. The proposal also provides means of redemption of farm mortgages already foreclosed.

We may differ somewhat as to the details of the provisions of a bill like this. Some may think that the interest should be 2 percent, some 3 percent, and some 4 percent. There may be a difference in the mechanics as to how the bill should operate, but it strikes me that the time should come when we should compromise the differences and pass a measure that will grant to the Commissioner under the governor of the Federal farm credits that has lately been set up by Executive order power, authority, and latitude to bring all of these loan agencies under one control, to work out a uniform system that will give the farmer the advantage of refinancing his mortgage, and doing it quickly, allowing the Commissioner the opportunity to sell the securities to raise these funds at the lowest possible rate of interest, fixing the maximum rate, but leaving a leeway to issue them at a lower rate, if possible.

I appreciate that there is a great variance of views in regard to a measure like this. Some may have the slant of the borrower, and believe that the provisions of the bill should look to the lowest rate of interest, and everything possible to allow the farmer to obtain the best possible terms. We all want that, but, on the other hand, the money that shall be used to refinance these loans must come from somewhere. It must come from the people of our country, the money of investors, and we have to take them into consideration. We want a well-balanced bill, that will operate on a practical basis, not only for the borrower but for the man who invests in these securities.

We appreciate that there has been a great depreciation on the value of farm securities, and stabilization must be worked out under the mechanics of this bill. We should take a broad-gage view of this as a practical provision that will look to the rehabilitation of the farmer. We know we have reached a crisis, we have reached a situation that is so desperate that an emergency exists, and we must act and act quickly in order to save the agriculture interests of the country in order to save the farmers of America. Every nation builds its civilization upon those who live upon the farms. If the farm is to be destroyed, if the farmer's home is to be taken away from him, and he is to be turned into the ranks of the unemployed, to swell the number that exists already in the cities, then we have reached the situation in our civilization where decadence is on the way and where we must acknowledge that the future of America, indeed, is in peril.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 1 minute more.

Mr. SNELL. I take it from the gentleman's statement that he is supporting the rule just the way it is brought in here?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. And that is under Democratic responsibility?

Mr. GREENWOOD. That is right.

Mr. SNELL. Is it going to be the policy of the Democratic majority to always take every single measure that comes from the other end of the Avenue as it is, without any consideration whatever by the House of Representatives?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Oh, the gentleman is asking me a question as to future measures which I cannot answer. We will take them and handle them in the best way that we deem advisable when they come, but this measure is a House measure, and we are endeavoring to pass it without regard to the other end of the Avenue.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman is not allowing any amendments to be offered to the bill. Is not that correct?

Mr. GREENWOOD. That is correct.

Mr. SNELL. That has never been the procedure in this House in the consideration heretofore of any farm measure, has it?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Oh, I do not know about farm measures.

Mr. SNELL. I am asking about farm measures.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Oh, I remember a great many more measures which the gentleman's party thought were emergency measures, for which was provided a rule—many measures, and what is the difference whether it be a farm measure or some other measure if an emergency exists?

Mr. SNELL. But this is fixing the policy of this Government for possibly 50 years to come.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to oppose the consideration of this legislation at this time. I fully realize the mortgage situation is a great national problem which confronts not only the farmers, but the owners of city property as well. It is a problem that ought to be before the American Congress at this time and I trust this bill will be followed by a similar measure to aid the distressed home owners. I rise simply to make my protest against its consideration under this gag rule which has been reported by the Committee on Rules. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD] says the rule was reported with the one purpose of expediting the passage of this legislation. If that be true, I would not want to get up on the floor of this House and admit that with a majority of 200 I was unable through party discipline to get action. If this is an emergency, the measure can be handled in the regular and orderly way and speedily passed.

What does the rule provide? I am explaining the situation which confronts us because some of the new Members of the House who have been here but a few weeks will never know, unless there is a change in the tactics of the Democratic leadership of the House, what it is to consider a bill in the proper way, and I am afraid that some of us older Members will forget how it is done. This rule provides, first, there shall be no amendment offered to the bill. It provides, further, every point of order shall be waived, and there is but one opportunity to make a motion to recommit. True enough, the rule gives all the time possible to talk. We can talk, but there is not a single Member of this House who can register his individual opinion on this important legislation which establishes a permanent Government policy.

What has been the history of this bill as far as it has gone? It has been before the Committee on Agriculture a few days. Only a few people had an opportunity to go before the committee and give expression to their views. It was before the Rules Committee and only the chairman in charge of the legislation had an opportunity to make a statement. I ask the Membership of the House, and particularly I ask you on the majority side of the House, how long are you going to permit the Congress to just be a rubber stamp for a few men who do not even have a seat in Congress? Is there not someone in this House who has been living with this agricultural problem for all these years who has the knowledge, if he had an opportunity, to present an amendment which would make this bill a far better bill for the farmer? Personally, I think there is, so I ask you liberal Democrats, you progressive Democrats, you Democrats who want to preserve the integrity of the House, to vote down the previous question, so that we may proceed to consider this bill in an orderly way, under the 5-minute rule, subject to amendment. Let us, at least in this one instance, be able to go out and say we had a part in the framing of this legislation.

I want to call attention right here and now to the fact there have only been three bills on the floor of this House during this session that have been subject to amendment. There was the beer bill, the District of Columbia beer bill, and the reforestation bill, which had the opposition of the chairman of the committee itself. All the rest of the legislation was brought here under an airtight rule. The Democratic leadership has gone so far that for over a year we have not had a Calendar Wednesday call. Not one during the last session and not one during this session. In conclusion, I ask you progressive Democrats, you liberal Democrats, to join with us on this side of the aisle and vote down the previous question, and we will have this bill considered in the way in which it ought to be considered. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, it is always amusing when you hear a good old stand-pat Republican appeal to what he calls the liberal and progressive Democrats on this side of the aisle. I want to tell him that that means all of us. [Applause.] We are all liberals and we are all progressives. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. A real serious one; yes.

Mr. SNELL. I want to appeal to what I consider the conservative Democrats. I want to appeal to the statements that were made by the Chairman of the Rules Committee at the beginning of the Seventy-second Congress. He not only is a conservative Democrat but an honored Democrat. I want to refer to the statements made by him, and then watch you vote on the previous question today.

Mr. O'CONNOR. In answer to the gentleman, if the gentleman uses the word "conservative" in the Republican sense, let me tell him there is no such person sitting on this side of the aisle. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. I will use it in any sense the gentleman wants to use it. I am not particular. I use it in the liberal sense or the conservative sense, but I am referring the gentleman to the statements made by the leaders of the Democratic Party at the beginning of the Seventy-second Congress, and you will eat those words if you vote against the previous question here today, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, we have had some experience with the tenders on the minority side in the last session of this Congress and in this Congress as to "cooperation"; and we heard some statements on the floor the other day that we must give due "consideration" to the measures hereafter brought in. Well, that is the old adage about "the Greeks bearing gifts." I have already seen in this present session where the minority side, under a pretense of "cooperation", was trying to scuttle the ship. I refer you only to the reforestation bill considered recently, when Members, with no sympathy with the measure, were offering amendments to make it all the more difficult for the people of the country to accept it.

I will never forget the time when we brought in the domestic-allotment plan wide open to amendments; how the minority sat with great glee and added minor commodities and voted in every possible way to make that measure ineffective, and then sat back and chuckled and said, "See how we are 'cooperating' with you."

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman mean to tell the country that he has not enough confidence in the 200 Democratic majority to put through in open debate, subject to amendment, in this House, an administration measure?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, we have heard no demand before the Rules Committee——

Mr. SNELL. You did not give any opportunity.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Now, let me answer the gentleman without any heat. I know the Republicans feel in great heat these days. They have gone through such—I was going to say destruction, but at least "embarrassment" during the last few years.

Mr. SNELL. There is no embarrassment here at present.

Mr. O'CONNOR. But let us keep cool about it. There has been no demand, as far as I know, from the Democratic side for amendment, but the demand for committee amendments came from a Democrat, and that was put in the rule. We feel that our Democratic committee, supported by all except two Republicans, I understand, who have lived with this measure, know best what amendments are proper.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Is not this the same kind of rule that was brought in by the other side on the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill?

Mr. SNELL. Oh, no; it is not the same kind of rule or the same kind of bill, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The only amendment that could be offered was an amendment offered by the committee during the consideration of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill.

Mr. SNELL. We provided for 4 days reading that bill.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. But I am talking about the rule on amendments.

Mr. SNELL. This bill is not even going to be read for amendment. I am willing to discuss the rule on the Hawley-Smoot bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZPATRICK] is only partly confused. What he may refer to is the vote on the conference report where we could not separate the items.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from New York 3 additional minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. They could not separate the items. They worked in the lumber fellows, the oil fellows, and the coal fellows. They had to vote for all of the items without any possibility of separation.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Separate votes were had upon them. They were considered on the floor of the House and voted into the bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. En bloc.

Mr. SNELL. Let me ask the gentleman another question—he has not answered my first one yet—does the gentleman mean to tell the country he is afraid to trust his 200 majority in the consideration of the bill?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, not at all.

Mr. SNELL. Then why not open it for amendment?

Mr. O'CONNOR. We were afraid of attempted sabotage against this bill for political purposes by the Republican Party.

Mr. SNELL. I am glad the gentleman gives us credit for having so much influence in the House. One to three; this shows we are a good deal more important than the gentleman's party.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It is not authoritative, is is just confusing. It would have no real substantial effect; it would just delay this measure, and we want to get it through this week.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman give us 4 hours to read and amend the bill instead of 8 hours to talk on the bill?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Let me conclude——

Mr. SNELL. Answer my question.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Let me conclude by saying that we Members from the great industrial centers of the country again are willing to support farm relief. We realize the plight of the farmers. We realize they are overburdened with mortgages. But we ask you gentlemen not to forget, when the other item of the administration program is presented, to take care of the home owners in our cities and urban communities—to give them aid.

I suppose there is no more distressing event in a person's life, except it be death, than to have his home foreclosed and he and his family be evicted on the streets.

We want to help the farmers. We ask you simply, when the occasion arises, that you help our people in the cities and the suburban developments to save their homes so they may live in the comfort to which they have been accustomed and keep up our standard of living in this Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset that I am in favor of the objects sought to be accomplished by this legislation.

I believe one of the crying needs of the times is a refinancing and a cutting down of the mortgage indebtedness of the country. This bill goes part way and proposes to refinance and to cut down the mortgage indebtedness of the farmer. I think it should be more liberal and more comprehensive. It should include the mortgage indebtedness of the home owner in the cities and villages as well as on the farms.

I have not had time to study carefully the bill, and I am sure no one in the House has, because the printed copy of it was available only today, and the report of the committee on it was available only a few minutes ago; but unless the debate discloses that there is something in the legislation that is grossly objectionable, I expect to vote for it at the end of the consideration of it. But it goes without saying I am opposed to this rule. I am opposed to this closed or gag rule. As I said once before during this session, this Congress has passed more gag rules during the short time it has been in session than have been passed by the House of Representatives before in a generation. This Congress was elected as a liberal Congress, yet in the passage of rules making legislation in order it has been most unliberal and most reactionary.

We have gone a long way in this respect in the last number of years. When I first came here, I remember the consideration of the Underwood tariff bill under the leadership of that great statesman, the leader of the Democratic majority in the House at that time, the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Underwood. The Democrats in that Congress, although their majority was not as great as it is now, did not attempt to consider even a tariff bill under a closed rule. They did hold a caucus and bound the members of their caucus to vote against any amendments that were not proposed by the Committee on Ways and Means; but I submit to the Democratic Members of this Congress that your leadership does not give you an opportunity to consider this and other legislation in caucus even. It brings in legislation under a gag rule which does not permit it to be read under the 5-minute rule. The rule is considered only by the members of the Committee on Rules, and the House is obliged to vote it up or down as submitted by that committee.

This legislation, although the gentleman from Indiana very properly says there may be a great variance of opinion about it, and although it attempts to lay down a policy that is new and very far-reaching, is going to be considered here and voted upon without any opportunity to offer or to vote upon any amendment except such as may be proposed by the Committee on Agriculture.

Why should not the House of Representatives during this session legislate deliberately after debate and consideration the same as in any other session? Let me say with all sincerity and with all earnestness that I think the concensus of opinion of the Membership of the House of Representatives after debate and after due consideration will work out a better bill than any committee or any one individual can propose without such help. If we vote down the previous question on the rule, then there will be an opportunity to amend it so as to require the bill to be read under the 5-minute rule and open to amendment. In that way the bill may be perfected and those who want some changes in it will at least have an opportunity to offer amendments and to express their views about them. If that is not done, then it is just a waste of time to take 8 hours' general debate on the bill. If that is not done, the debate might as well be limited to 15 minutes and the legislation voted up or down at the end of that time. The rule should either be changed or the time for general debate might just as well be materially cut down.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DOBBINS].

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Speaker, as a friend of the farmer and coming from a farming district and knowing the farming needs, I want to deplore the partisan character of this discussion. When it comes to a question of relief for the farmers this middle aisle here does not mean a thing. There is just as big a proportion of friends of the farmer on one side of this aisle as the other.

I want to commend the strategy of the friends of this rule on my side of the House who pretend that this is a partisan question and in the same breadth I must withhold compliment to the gentlemen on this side who fall into the same error.

This is not a partisan question, and I may say to the men here in this House who want the oppressed owner of mortgaged land to have relief that you should realize that you are deciding that question when you vote on this rule. I do not suppose many of you have read the bill completely. I have read it and I have read the Senate bill, and I may say to my friend from New York that it differs from the Senate bill and is more liberal than the Senate bill, but it is not by any means liberal enough.

I am not against the bill that comes from the committee. I am going to vote for it if it is the best we can get. I am going to vote for it because I believe that half a loaf is better than none, or to use a more accurate simile, because even a crumb is better than half a loaf.

The man on the farm who has his land mortgaged and needs relief is the man whose land is mortgaged almost, if not wholly, to its full value. Do you know that this bill that comes here will not extend any relief whatever to him? The only man owning a farm who can derive any benefit from this bill is a man who is able to offer $2 of security for every dollar he borrows, and add to that $5 of security in the way of improvements on his farm for every additional dollar that he borrows.

Is this farm relief? Is this relief for the mortgagors? I defy anyone who favors this rule to explain how this can help the oppressed owner of mortgaged land.

Do you call this measure Government relief for the farmer? The Government does not risk one thing under this bill. The man who takes the risk or the organization that takes the risk under this bill is the Federal land bank; and if the Federal land bank makes an unwise mortgage, they, and not the Government, will lose. The Government does not guarantee them against one cent of loss. As a consequence the wise men who run these banks are not going to make risky mortgages, and the farmer who needs relief is not going to get it.

This bill reminds me of the egg that was served to the young pastor calling upon one of his parishioners. The egg had been neglected too long between the time it was laid and the time when it was brought to the table. He did not seem to enjoy it, and his hostess said, "What is the matter, pastor, do you not like your egg?" He thought for a moment of some courteous reply and said, "Oh, yes, madam; parts of it are very good." [Laughter.] This is the condition of the bill that we are to debate here for 8 hours. There is not any use of debating this bill if we cannot liberalize it for the man who needs this money and needs it now. No emergency calls for a rule that shuts off amendments that will make it fit for the farmer, because if it is an emergency it is an emergency that is 12 years old, and we should not be discovering it right now.

I may say to you that as a measure of relief for the farmer this bill is a gold brick, and I come from a part of the country where we at last know a gold brick when we see one. I know the Members of this House well enough to know that there is not one of you who would consciously offer to the oppressed farmer of this Nation a gold brick; and I tell you again that when you vote upon this rule, then, and not at the end of 8 hours of futile debate are you deciding whether or not you are going to give to the farmers of this country any real mortgage relief.

Mr. KELLER. How should we vote?

Mr. DOBBINS. Vote against the motion for the previous question, and vote against this rule in the interest of the farmer. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the gentleman from Illinois, who has just taken his seat. I believe he voiced the views of a large number of the Membership of this House. We on the Committee on Rules who opposed this rule are not opposed to the consideration of this measure. We are for the consideration of the measure, and the most of us are for the measure.

But there is no emergency as was the bank situation on the day of inauguration. It seems to be the practice of the leadership of the majority in this Congress to entirely wipe out the normal functions of the House of Representatives and allow us merely to vote yes or no on the completed measure without an opportunity to consider, deliberate, and make suggestions with respect to changes.

This bill is 23 pages in length. It is a matter of great importance. It is not a perfect bill. If they considered it a perfect bill, they would not have amended the resolution, which was absolutely closed when it was introduced. But they had this language added:

> No amendment shall be in order to said bill.

And here is the new language:

> except amendments offered by direction of the Committee on Agriculture, and said amendments shall be in order, any rule of the House to the contrary notwithstanding.

If this were a perfect measure, why throw it open to amendment by the committee that has just reported it? It is a hastily drawn measure, brought here for consideration on the floor, and amendments by whom? Only by those who have predetermined what the majority of the House must do.

There are persons in the city today, representatives of agricultural interests from various States in the great agricultural sections of our country, and these people are not satisfied with all of the provisions of this measure and have suggestions to make. When their suggestions are not given consideration, when they are not permitted to be made, what is a Member representing the district from which these people come going to say? "I am a Member of the House of Representatives. I have been elected by you to take care of your interests. Here is a bill vitally affecting you, and you want certain modifications of the bill. I am so weak and pusillanimous that I will not permit myself to act on your suggestions in the House."

Mr. SHANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. SHANNON. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that we are not permitted to amend the amendment offered by the Agricultural Committee.

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is true. I tried to make my remarks as brief as possible, and therefore did not mention that. Why, gentlemen, it has come to this point in this body for us to ask, Who is running the House of Representatives—3 or 4 leaders or the collective Membership who are supposed to be free to exercise their judgment and represent the wishes of their constituents? Vote down the previous question, and if there are any differences iron them out on the floor.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. As a matter of fact, instead of this being an emergency, is not this fixing a Government policy in regard to these matters for a period of 30 or 40 years?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Permanently. It is not any unforeseen emergency.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes more to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. McGUGIN. Is it not true that the man or woman who sits here on this floor today and votes for this rule is guilty of gross deceit and hypocrisy when he goes out home and says that he was not satisfied with the bill and wanted a better one, when in fact he voted to make it impossible to better this rule?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is true; but as a previous speaker said, this bill carries no relief to the man who is in a hole today, because he cannot pay his mortgage.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman has been a Member of the House for a great many years. I think he was a Member during the entire time that the Republican Party was in control of the House of Representatives. I ask the gentleman whether he ever voted for a rule during all that time, proposed by his own party, which cut off the right of amendment?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I presume I have, but circumstances alter cases.

Mr. BYRNS. And if he has not a number of times voted for just such a rule, which denied the right of amendment, including important bills like the tariff bill?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Oh, no; I do not recall ever having voted for a rule on a tariff bill that precluded amendment.

Mr. BYRNS. But the gentleman voted for a rule which provided a subterfuge and which gave to the committee the right to propose amendments, thereby denying such right to the individual Members of the House.

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is a construction which the gentleman places upon that rule and I do not agree with him. But the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD], a member of the Committee on Rules, in his opening address said this, and if this is not the quintessence of irony, I do not know what it is. He said some want a little different rate of interest, and some want a little difference in the mechanics of the bill, and so, let us compromise. How are they compromising? How are they composing these differences? It is done by saying to those who wish to suggest something else, you are not even permitted to make a suggestion with regard to the changing of a single word, the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t" in this bill. Anyone who represents farmers who have other views which they want him to express on this floor is a coward if he does not vote down the previous question. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, in 10 years' service in the House one's viewpoint changes materially. I have recalled during this special session with some degree of amusement the first speech that I ever made when I became a Member of the House. In fact, I became so much interested in it that I dug up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and read it, and I find that it was a very vehement, though I fear not impressive, protest against a so-called "gag rule" that our friends the Republicans were forcing down the throats of us Democrats. My good friend from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] has just summed up the whole situation with reference to one's viewpoint on this gag rule when he said in answer to a question by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], "Yes; I presume I have voted for such, but circumstances were different." Of course they are different. For 10 years we Democrats have been gagging, and now you gentlemen are gagging.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Not now. I shall in a moment. On November 8—and I say this with all kindness—the people of the country gagged. They gagged because the dose you gentlemen were giving them was a little too much to swallow, and they wanted a little different remedy for the ills of the country. I agree with everything my friends say about the desirability of orderly consideration of legislation and the free right of amendment; but, gentlemen, this bill is sent to this Congress in compliance with a solemn pledge made to the people of America by Franklin D. Roosevelt. Those of us who have been here for a few years know that probably there could be 435 different proposals or plans in this House now for the relief of the farmer. Each of us has his own ideas about it. For 11 years we have talked and tried to legislate for the farmer. We voted for the Farm Board, for Mr. Hoover, and it did not get us anywhere. Other efforts have been made and other plans suggested. Mr. Roosevelt said to the farmers of America, "If you trust me, I can lead you back in the ways of peace, happiness, and prosperity." This bill is Franklin D. Roosevelt's bill; it is a part of his plan to help the farmer; and the Democrats of the House, if I interpret their attitude aright, are perfectly willing and satisfied to trust the leadership of the President and the leadership of the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, Mr. MARVIN D. JONES, and his colleagues on that committee who have approved the bill.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The gentleman said that now the Republicans are being gagged. Does the gentleman not know that he is gagging a large proportion of his own membership?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not think so.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. In a moment. I have no doubt that many of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle are perfectly sincere in their effort to help the farmer, and in that effort would do this, that, or the other to this bill, but where would we get? Here is an orderly plan, brought here after careful thought and consideration, and the administration that has been trusted by the people has a right to come before the country and stand or fall according to whether its own plan is able to bring the relief that it has promised to the people. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman has such unlimited confidence in the Members of his own side, why has he not confidence enough to let them vote down any amendment in open House that might be offered to the bill?

Mr. WOODRUM. The Democrats feel—and when I say Democrats I mean the leadership, because our leadership is unanimous upon it—that this bill is having orderly consideration. Here is a well-thought-out plan for relief of the farmer we have talked so much about and, I fear, done so little about. It is a plan that goes to the very heart of the trouble. It helps the farmer, who finds himself with no market for his crops, and his property covered in mortgages that he cannot pay, or on which he cannot pay the interest charges. It helps him refinance himself.

It is brought here; the President has asked for it; the Committee on Agriculture has considered it; they have put their stamp of approval upon it, and now we bring it here. I say it is orderly consideration when we say to you gentlemen that you may look at it and decide whether or not you will go along with us. Most of you gentlemen, although you are complaining about the method of procedure, are going to go right along and vote for this bill. Now, why do you not take the responsibility? If it is not a good bill, why do you not vote against it?

Mr. SNELL. I am not finding any fault with the bill, as far as I know, but I should like an opportunity to amend it; and I want to say another word to the gentleman, what is the use of spending 8 hours in futile talk if you do not intend to change one line of the entire bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY].

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, I have been a Member of this House for 12 years, yet I confess that I have never spoken when I felt there was so much at stake in a pending rule affecting the very character of the House itself. I have just had an opportunity to skim the speech of the present Chairman of the Rules Committee made at the opening of the Seventy-second Congress. He had then completed a service of 31 years. The result of his long experience led him to express his concern that the House had been controlled too much by 2 or 3 men. He referred to that control as autocratic.

Some of us today are concerned in that we think this House is gradually losing the characteristics of a representative body. The responsibility rests with everyone of us to fight to retain our representative rights, and I speak not as a partisan; what I say at this moment I would divorce from partisanship. I am decidedly jealous of the respect in the public mind for this, the lower House of the legislative branch of the Government. It has slowly been losing the respect of the public, and deservedly so.

For one reason, we seem to forget that session after session thousands of people come from hither and yon in this country, and from these galleries look down upon a scene of gross disorder, a scene which would be a disgrace to the ordinary grade school. These visiting thousands go back home and report the disorder to others. Naturally they are at a loss to understand how we are able to give any deliberation to legislative problems. I do not wonder at it. That is one reason why we are losing public confidence.

The second reason is that we are yielding, little by little, every vestige of the power truly to consider legislation on this floor. The responsibility for leadership always rests heavily with the majority party. The party program must be completed, and frequently time is of the essence. This is particularly true when bills comprising more than 100 pages are being considered. Take the last tariff bill for example. It involved the holding of hearings running through weeks; it required nearly a week of consideration under general debate. Time was in such a case of great importance. The rule employed in considering the Smoot-Hawley bill, of necessity, limited the right to amend. Only members of the Ways and Means Committee were given the right to offer amendments on the floor, but the rights of Members were protected in this way: While general debate continued, the Ways and Means Committee was in session every forenoon for the sole purpose of permitting Members to propose amendments. In many cases the amendments proposed by Members were accepted by the committee and introduced by it on the floor of the House. Thus the rights of Members to represent their constituents were preserved.

But never since I became a Member of this House have I known of a rule like that at present proposed, which prevents a Member from proposing even an amendment to a committee amendment on this floor. The proposed rule prevents it, as the gentleman from Missouri has said, and I call it a gagged gag rule. This is the rule which the leaders of the majority party propose to govern the consideration of its farm-relief measure, a measure of tremendous consequence, not merely for the next year or two, but for a generation.

This farm-relief problem has been concerning us for 12 years, to my knowledge. At the beginning of the Sixty-seventh Congress the first thing the Republican Party tried to do was to bring relief to the farmers through a revision of the tariff. From that day to this the best minds of the country have been seeking some means through legislation to help the farmers. I do not think the cost of agricultural production and distribution, the stabilization of agricultural markets, and the control of surplus world production, all of which must be adjusted and righted before farming will be profitable—I say I do not think these things can be accomplished by passing laws. True, the financial burden under which the farmer now labors, the carrying of a mortgage which in many instances exceeds the value of the farm itself, is undoubtedly a fundamental agricultural difficulty which law may remedy. I am, therefore, in sympathy with the aim of the measure which the proposed rule makes in order. However, I submit that the proposed rule, which gives the Members of this House no right to propose a single amendment, which provides for general debate of 8 hours, in which Members may express their views but renders them powerless even to propose that their views shall be written into law, I submit that such a rule should be voted down. It robs this House of its representative and deliberative character.

You tell us that we should not take the time to amend. That is not a tenable excuse. If this farm-relief program is important, as, indeed, it is, why did you not consider it last January? Why did you postpone it while the sale of beer was being legalized, while the repeal of the eighteenth amendment was being discussed, while time was taken to consider all the other ills of the country and agriculture waited? Now, I say it is not right to force gag rule upon us on the ground there is not time to consider proposals of Members designed to improve the proposed farm-mortgage legislation. I protest against the rule and shall not support it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL].

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I expect to vote for this bill. I want to suggest to the membership of the House, however, that it is the first time in my experience in this House where a bill relating to agricultural problems has been forced through or attempted to be forced through without an opportunity of amendment. Many farm bills have been considered by this House, but they have always been open for amendment and improvement. There can be no harm in submitting this bill for such amendments as may be offered for its improvement. I apprehend some good amendments will be offered, and it seems to me this House ought to have the opportunity of considering and accepting a good amendment when it is offered. For one, I want to emphasize that we should vote down the previous question and amend the rule, and give an opportunity for any Member to present an amendment that he believes will help the farmers of this country. This bill affects every farmer in the United States, and they have the right to any good amendment that can be offered to this bill which will improve their condition.

I am hoping that this House will see fit to give the Members an opportunity to present amendments to this bill, that they may have consideration on the floor. I hope the motion for the previous question will be voted down, and that the rule may be amended before it is adopted allowing consideration of these amendments.

Everything that can be offered which will improve the condition of the farmers of the country should be presented. They are in dire need of assistance, and we should give them all the help we are able to give them. And we should give this to them now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I think I can stand on this floor and address myself to a subject without every word I utter being discounted by the cry of partisanship. I am reasonably liberal. I do not always go along with my party on every matter. I have been going along to an exceedingly great degree with the administration in this emergency program.

I shall not direct my remarks to the Republican membership, because I do not believe it is necessary. I shall confine my remarks primarily to the Democratic membership of this House, because it is you Democrats who are voting for these rules.

You are now voting upon a rule, the very terms of which provide that you as individuals cannot offer one word of improvement to this bill. You Democratic Members of this House, when the farm bill was before us, passed a rule which made it utterly impossible to amend or improve the farm bill.

If this rule passes today, you Democratic Members are by your votes voting for a rule that makes it utterly impossible to offer one amendment to this farm mortgage bill. Reduce this to its honest-to-God truth and here is what it is: When you, you Democratic Members of this House, voted for a rule which would not permit a single amendment to the farm relief bill, then and there you declared yourselves in solemn terms as standing upon that farm bill in all its respects. Every Democratic Member who voted for the rule which made it utterly impossible to amend the farm bill, makes himself a fraud and a deceiver if he goes out to his people and says that that farm bill does not suit him in its entirety. It must, of necessity, have suited you Democrats in its entirety or you would not have voted for a rule making it impossible to amend the farm bill.

Now, coming back to this bill today, every Democrat who votes for this rule votes that this bill shall not be amended in any respect; and when he does this he must stand before his country as unqualifiedly satisfied with this mortgage relief bill as it is, without any changes.

Let me say to you Democratic Members from farm sections that if you vote for this rule and then you start writing letters to your farmers telling them that this was the best you could get, you are not writing the truth back to your constituents. You could have gotten something better, except that you voted for a rule which made it impossible for you to get anything better. My remarks have here been addressed to you Democrats, because in a spirit of "party bootlicking" you are the ones who are voting for these rules which prevent any amendments to these farm bills. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, we have heard a good deal said during the course of this debate in criticism of the action of the Democratic leadership on this bill and of the action of the Rules Committee with reference to the form of this rule, most of which criticism came from the Republican side of the House.

Because the matter may come up hereafter, I want now once and for all to lay this ghost they are seeking to have walk here before some of the new Members this morning with reference to the innocence of the Republican leadership when they were in power on this question of gag rule. I want to cite the RECORD, because a number of us were here when this bill for the consideration of what the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] calls the "Hoot-Smalley" bill came up for consideration. I want to show you gentlemen of this House that the very things we are offering in the consideration of this bill today is but a following of the distinguished precedents set by the Republican Committee on Rules for the consideration of that bill. The RECORD cannot be denied. The gentleman from New York, the gentleman from Massachusetts, the gentleman from New Jersey, and the gentleman from Maine will remember that rule. Here is what it provided. Remember that there was a bill called up by the Republican Committee on Ways and Means at a special session of Congress called by a Republican President to undertake some relief for the farmers of this country. That is what it was.

The purpose of that bill was to undertake to give relief to the farmers of this country. What did that bill provide? It was not a bill like the one now pending, a bill of 22 pages, but a great voluminous bill containing hundreds of pages and involving many hundreds of schedules upon which the minds of Members of this House would certainly differ, yet the distinguished gentleman from New York, now the minority leader, then the Chairman of the Committee on Rules, brought in a rule providing so many hours of general debate on that bill, providing the time when the final vote should be taken on the bill, and the following liberality of amendments that might be proposed.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No. Let me get this embalmed in the RECORD so there will be no dispute about it hereafter.

Here is what the rule provided. I will read that part of it:

> That general debate on the bill do now close. That the bill shall be considered for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

Mark carefully what follows:

> But committee amendments to any part of the bill shall be in order at any time.

Now, let me show you how they took advantage of that so-called "liberal rule" with hundreds of pages of this bill to be considered—and I see my friend SNELL smiling at the ingenuity he exercised when the bill came up. My friends, under that rule for amendment I want to show you here in the RECORD how much of the Smoot-Hawley bill was read for consideration. There it is, that one paragraph only, because they so manipulated the time and so manipulated the so-called committee amendments that the effect was absolutely to deny to the Members of the House any opportunity to amend the bill.

If I have not stated the RECORD correctly I yield now to be corrected.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman from Alabama is always fair. It may be admitted that as a practical matter both parties in the consideration of tariff bills have found it necessary to bring in rules somewhat limiting the opportunity to offer amendments to tariff measures.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Do not take too much of my time; ask a question if you want to.

Mr. MAPES. Does the gentleman know of any rule the Republican Party ever brought in limiting the opportunity of offering amendments to a big legislative bill such as this?

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I said a few days ago here in this House, I have been here a long time. All I ever learned about gag rules was from being a minority member of a committee under Republican control.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman will agree that he had a good teacher.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And the gentleman from New York ought to be very much gratified that he has lived to see the time when even Democrats follow the illustrious precedents set by his committee when he was in charge of it.

Now, enough about this.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for just a short question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. I just want to ask what position the gentleman and the other Democratic leaders took on the very rule which the gentleman has been criticizing?

Mr. BANKHEAD. We did just as you are doing now. [Laughter and applause.] We got up here and made a hypocritical pretense of opposing the rule. That is what we did exactly.

Mr. BEEDY rose.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, the serious-minded gentleman from Maine rises, and the gentleman says he has been here for 12 years and never in all his long experience, on a great proposition affecting agriculture and the farmers of this country, has he seen such high-handed procedure followed in this House.

Mr. Speaker, what the farmers of this country are complaining about, and the complaint they registered last November is that during the 12 long years when your party had control of the Government of this country it did absolutely nothing of a practical nature to relieve agriculture in this country, although it made some gesture to that effect [applause], and what the Democratic Party is undertaking to do through this bill and through this administration program is to meet a desperate and critical situation by seeking to give the home owners of this country—the farmers in this bill and the city dwellers in the bill soon to be sent up—an opportunity to reduce the interest rates upon their loans, an opportunity to make compositions with their creditors, and an opportunity to pay the necessary amount to save their homes from foreclosure and loss.

This is what is involved in the pending bill. All this talk about this rule is merely partisan and captious criticism upon the part of those on the other side.

We have brought a bill here that has been maturely considered by a great committee of this House that is interested in farming and the leadership here, the Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee, and the chairman of this committee, and the Democratic members of the committee, ask you Democrats to go forward in our program and to pass this bill and get it enacted into law at the earliest possible moment. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 254, nays 130, answered "present" 1, not voting 45, as follows:

Mr. JACOBSEN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. WEARIN, is absent on account of illness. If present, he would have voted "aye."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DELANEY). The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 178 ayes and 19 noes.

So the resolution was agreed to.

EMERGENCY FARM MORTGAGE ACT

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 4795, to provide emergency relief with respect to agricultural indebtedness, to refinance farm mortgages at lower rates of interest, to amend and supplement the Federal Farm Loan Act, to provide for the orderly liquidation of joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. ARNOLD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. BLANTON. With the understanding that the bill be printed in the RECORD, I will not object.

Mr. JONES. I will include that in my request.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

TITLE I. AMENDMENTS TO FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT

ISSUANCE OF BONDS BY LAND BANKS

SECTION 1. Section 32 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 991), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Until such time as the Farm Loan Commissioner determines that Federal farm-loan bonds (other than those issued under this paragraph) are readily salable in the open market at a yield not in excess of 4 percent per annum, but in no case more than 2 years after this paragraph takes effect, Federal land banks may issue farm-loan bonds as authorized under this act for the purpose of making new loans or for purchasing mortgages or exchanging bonds for mortgages as provided in paragraph 'Second' of section 13 of this act. The aggregate amount of the bonds issued under this paragraph shall not exceed $2,000,000,000, and such bonds shall be issued in such denominations as the Farm Loan Commissioner shall prescribe, shall bear interest at a rate not in excess of 4 percent per annum, and shall be fully and unconditionally guaranteed as to interest by the United States, and such guaranty shall be expressed on the face thereof. In the event that the issuing bank or banks shall be unable to pay upon demand, when due, the interest on any such bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the amount thereof, which is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Upon the payment of such interest by the Secretary of the Treasury, the amount so paid shall become an obligation to the United States of the issuing bank or banks and shall bear interest at the same rate as that borne by the bonds upon which the interest has been so paid. After the expiration of 1 year from the date this paragraph takes effect, if in the opinion of the Farm Loan Commissioner any part of the proceeds of the bonds authorized to be issued under this paragraph is not required for the purpose of making new loans or for purchasing mortgages or exchanging bonds for mortgages as herein provided, such bonds may be issued within the maximum limit herein specified for the purpose of refinancing any outstanding issues of Federal farm-loan bonds; but no such bonds shall be issued after 2 years from the date this paragraph takes effect for the purpose of such refinancing."

PURCHASE, REDUCTION, AND REFINANCING OF FARM MORTGAGES

SEC. 2. Section 13 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, is amended by adding after paragraph "Second" the following new paragraph:

"In order to reduce and/or refinance farm mortgages, to invest such funds as may be in its possession in the purchase of qualified first mortgages on farm lands situated within the Federal land-bank district within which it is organized or for which it is acting, or to exchange farm-loan bonds for any duly recorded first mortgages on farm lands executed prior to the date this paragraph takes effect, at a price which shall not exceed in each individual case the amount of the unpaid principal of the mortgage on the date of such purchase or exchange, or 50 percent of the value of the land mortgaged and 20 percent of the value of the permanent insured improvements thereon, as determined upon an appraisal made pursuant to this act, whichever is the smaller: Provided, That any mortgagor whose mortgage is acquired by a Federal land bank under this paragraph shall be entitled to have his farm-mortgage indebtedness refinanced in accordance with the provisions of sections 7 and 8 of this act on the basis of the amount paid by the bank for his mortgage."

EXTENSION OF LOANS

SEC. 3. Paragraph "tenth" of section 13 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 781), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The terms of any such extension shall be such as will not defer the collection of any obligation due by any borrower which, after investigation by the bank of the situation of such borrower, is shown to be within his capacity to meet. In the case of any such extension made prior to the expiration of 5 years from the date this paragraph as amended takes effect, or in the case of any deferment of principal as provided in paragraph 'twelfth' of section 12 of this act, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, on behalf of the United States, upon the request of the Federal land bank making the extension, and with the approval of the Farm Loan Commissioner, to subscribe at such periods as the Commissioner shall determine, to the paid-in surplus of such bank an amount equal to the amount of all such extensions and deferments made by the bank during the preceding period. Such subscriptions shall be subject to call, in whole or in part, by the bank with the approval of the Commissioner upon 30 days' notice. To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to make such subscriptions to the paid-in surplus of the Federal land banks, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $50,000,000, to be immediately available and remain available until expended. Upon payment to any Federal land bank of the amount of any such subscription, such bank shall execute and deliver a receipt therefor to the Secretary of the Treasury in form to be prescribed by the Farm Loan Commissioner. The amount of any subscriptions to the paid-in surplus of any such bank may be repaid in whole or in part at any time in the discretion of the bank and with the approval of the Farm Loan Commissioner, and the Commissioner may at any time require such subscriptions to be repaid in whole or in part if in his opinion the bank has resources available therefor."

REDUCTION OF INTEREST ON LOANS AND DEFERMENT OF PRINCIPAL

SEC. 4. Section 12 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, secs. 771–772), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Twelfth. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph second, the rate of interest on any loans on mortgage made through national farm-loan associations, or through agents as provided in section 15, by any Federal land bank, outstanding on the date of this paragraph takes effect or made within 2 years after such date, shall not exceed 4½ percent per annum for all interest payable on installment dates occurring within a period of 5 years commencing 60 days after the date this paragraph takes effect; and no payment of the principal portion of any installment of any such loan shall be required during such 5-year period if the borrower shall not be in default with respect to any other condition or covenant of his mortgage. The foregoing provisions shall apply to loans made by Federal land banks through branches, except that the rate of interest on such loans for such 5-year period shall be 5 percent in lieu of 4½ percent. The Secretary of the Treasury shall pay each Federal land bank, as soon as practicable after October 1, 1933, and after the end of each quarter thereafter, such amount as the Farm Loan Commissioner certifies to the Secretary of the Treasury is equal to the amount by which interest payments on mortgages held by such bank have been reduced, during the preceding quarter, by reason of this paragraph; but in any case in which the Farm Loan Commissioner finds that the amount of interest payable by such bank during any quarter has been reduced by reason of the refinancing of bonds under section 32 of this act, the amount of the reduction so found shall be deducted from the amount payable to such bank under this paragraph. No payments shall be made to a bank with respect to any period after June 30, 1938. There is authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $15,000,000 for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Treasury to make payments to Federal land banks which accrue during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and such additional amounts as may be necessary to make payments accruing during subsequent fiscal years."

INCREASE OF AMOUNT OF LOANS TO BORROWERS

SEC. 5. Paragraph "seventh" of section 12 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 771) (relating to the limitations as to amount of loans), is amended by striking out "$25,000" and inserting "$50,000, but loans to any one borrower shall not exceed $25,000 unless approved by the Farm Loan Commissioner."

DIRECT LOANS

SEC. 6. Section 7 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the last paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof the following new paragraphs:

"Whenever it shall appear to the Farm Loan Commissioner that national farm-loan associations have not been formed in any locality in the continental United States, or that the farmers residing in the territory covered by the charter of a national farm-loan association are unable to apply to the Federal land bank of the district for loans on account of the inability of the bank to accept applications from such association, the Farm Loan Commissioner may, in his discretion, authorize said bank to make direct loans to borrowers secured by first mortgages on farm lands situated within any such locality or territory. Except as herein otherwise specifically provided, all provisions of this act applicable with respect to loans made through national farm-loan associations shall, insofar as practicable, apply with respect to such direct loans, and the Farm Loan Commissioner is authorized to make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary with respect to such direct loans.

"The rate of interest on such direct loans made at any time by any Federal land bank shall be one half of 1 per centum per annum in excess of the rate of interest charged to borrowers on mortgage loans made at such time by the bank through national farm-loan associations.

"Each borrower who obtains a direct loan from a Federal land bank shall subscribe and pay for stock in such bank in the sum of $5 for each $100 or fraction thereof borrowed. Such stock shall be held by such Federal land bank as collateral security for the loan of the borrower and shall participate in all dividends. Upon full payment of the loan such stock shall, if still outstanding, be canceled at par, or, in the event that such stock shall have become impaired, at the estimated value thereof as approved by the Farm Loan Commissioner, and the proceeds thereof shall be paid to the borrower.

"Each such borrower may covenant in his mortgage that, whenever there are 10 or more borrowers who have obtained from a Federal land bank direct loans under the provisions of this section aggregating not less than $20,000, and who reside in a locality which may, in the opinion of the Farm Loan Commissioner, be conveniently covered by the charter of and served by a national farm-loan association, he will unite with such other borrowers to form a national farm-loan association. Such borrowers shall organize the association subject to the requirements and the conditions specified in this section, so far as the same may be applicable, and in accordance with rules and regulations of the Farm Loan Commissioner. As soon as the organization of the association has been approved by the Farm Loan Commissioner the stock in the Federal land bank held by each of the members of such association shall be canceled at par, and in lieu thereof the bank shall issue in the name of the association an equal amount of stock in said bank, which stock shall be held by said bank as collateral security as provided in this section with respect to other loans through national farm-loan associations. Thereupon there shall be issued to each such member an amount of capital stock in the association equal to the amount which he previously held in said bank, which stock shall be held by said association as collateral security as provided in section 8 of this act. The board of directors of said association shall adopt a resolution authorizing and directing its secretary-treasurer on behalf of said association to endorse, and thereby become liable for the payment of, the mortgages taken from its charter members by the Federal land bank. When it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Farm Loan Commissioner that all the foregoing conditions have been complied with, and upon the granting of the charter by the Farm Loan Commissioner, the interest rate paid by each charter member of such association whose loan is in good standing shall, beginning with his next regular installment date, be reduced to the rate of interest paid by borrowers on new loans made through national farm-loan associations in the same Federal land bank district at the time the said loan was made to such charter member.

"Charges to be paid by applicants for direct loans from a Federal land bank shall not exceed amounts to be fixed by the Farm Loan Commissioner and shall in no case exceed the charges which may be made to applicants for loans and borrowers through national farm-loan associations under the provisions of sections 11 and 13 of this act."

LOANS TO RECEIVERS

SEC. 7. Any receiver appointed by the Federal Farm Loan Board pursuant to section 29 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, is authorized, for the purpose of paying taxes on farm real estate owned by the bank or securing the mortgages held by it, with the approval of the Farm Loan Commissioner, to borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and to issue receiver's certificates against the assets of such bank as security for any loan received from the Corporation under this section, and such certificates shall constitute a prior lien on such assets. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to make loans to such receivers for the purposes of this section.

TITLE II. JOINT-STOCK LAND BANKS

LIMITATIONS ON ISSUE OF BONDS AND LENDING

SEC. 201. After the date of enactment of this act, no joint-stock land bank shall issue any tax-exempt bonds or make any farm loans except such as are necessary and incidental to the refinancing of existing loans or bond issues or to the sale of any real estate now owned or hereafter acquired by such bank.

LOANS TO JOINT-STOCK LAND BANKS TO PROVIDE FOR ORDERLY LIQUIDATION

SEC. 202. (a) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed to make available to the Farm Loan Commissioner, out of the funds of the corporation, the sum of $100,000,000, to be used, for a period not exceeding 2 years from the date of enactment of this act, for the purpose of making loans to the joint-stock land banks organized and doing business under the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, at a rate of interest not to exceed 4 percent per annum, payable annually. Such loans shall be made upon application therefor by such banks and upon compliance with the requirements of this section. Such loans shall be made to aid the orderly liquidation of any such bank in accordance with such plan as may be approved by the Farm Loan Commissioner. Before any such plan is approved by the Commissioner he shall be satisfied that the plan carries out the purposes of this section and that such part of the proceeds of the loan as is devoted to settlements with bondholders will be used only to effect an equitable settlement with all bondholders. After the plan has been approved by the Commissioner he shall require the bank to mail a copy thereof to all its known bondholders and to publish a notice setting forth its provisions in at least three newspapers having general circulation. The amount which may be loaned hereunder to any such bank shall not exceed an amount having the same proportion to the said $100,000,000 as the unpaid principal of the mortgages held by such bank on the date of enactment of this act bears to the total amount of the unpaid principal of the mortgages held by all the joint-stock land banks on such date.

(b) Any joint-stock land bank applying for a loan under this section shall deliver to the Farm Loan Commissioner as collateral security therefor first mortgages or purchase-money mortgages on farm lands, first mortgages on farm real estate owned by the bank in fee simple, or such other collateral as may be available to said bank, including sales contracts and sheriff's certificates on farm lands. The real estate upon which such collateral is based shall be appraised by appraisers appointed under the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, and the borrowing bank shall be entitled to borrow not to exceed 60 percent of the value of such real estate as determined by such appraisal. Fees for such appraisals shall be paid by the applicant banks in such amounts as may be fixed by the Farm Loan Commissioner. No such loan shall be made until the applicant bank, under regulations to be prescribed by the Farm Loan Commissioner, (1) shall have agreed to grant to each borrower then indebted to the bank under the terms of a first mortgage a reduction to 5 percent per annum in the rate of interest specified in such mortgage, beginning at his next regular installment date occurring more than 60 days after the date of enactment of this act, and (2) shall have agreed to the satisfaction of the Commissioner that during a period of 2 years from the date of enactment of this act the bank will not proceed against the mortgagor on account of default in the payment of interest or principal due under the terms of its mortgage and will not foreclose its mortgage unless the property covered by such mortgage is abandoned by the mortgagor or unless, in the opinion of the Commissioner, such foreclosure is necessary for other reasons.

LOANS BY THE FARM LOAN COMMISSIONER TO JOINT-STOCK LAND BANKS FOR EMERGENCY PURPOSES

SEC. 203. (a) Out of the funds made available to him under section 202, the Farm Loan Commissioner is authorized to make loans, at a rate of interest not to exceed 4 percent per annum, to any joint-stock land bank for the purpose of securing the postponement for 2 years from the date of the enactment of this section of the foreclosure of first mortgages held by such banks on account of (1) default in the payment of interest and principal due under the terms of the mortgage, and (2) unpaid delinquent taxes, excluding interest and penalties, which may be secured by the lien of said mortgage: Provided, That during the period of postponement of foreclosure such bank shall charge the mortgagor interest at a rate not exceeding 4 percent per annum on the aggregate amount of such delinquent taxes and defaulted interest and principal with respect to which loans are made pursuant to this section. The amount loaned to any joint-stock land bank under this section shall be made without reappraisal: Provided, That the amount loaned with respect to any mortgage on account of unpaid principal shall not exceed 5 percent of the total unpaid principal of such mortgage, and the total amount loaned to any such land bank with respect to any mortgage shall not exceed 25 percent of the total unpaid principal of such mortgage.

(b) No such loan shall be made with respect to any mortgage unless the Farm Loan Commissioner is satisfied that the mortgagor, after exercising ordinary diligence to pay his accrued delinquent taxes and meet accrued interest and principal payments, has defaulted thereon; and unless the bank shall have agreed to the satisfaction of the Farm Loan Commissioner that during such 2-year period the bank will not foreclose such mortgage unless the property covered thereby is abandoned by the mortgagor or unless, in the opinion of the Farm Loan Commissioner, such foreclosure is necessary for other reasons.

(c) Each such loan shall be secured by an assignment to the Farm Loan Commissioner of the lien of the taxes and/or of the bank's mortgage with respect to which the loan is made: Provided, That the part of each such lien so assigned representing the interest and principal due and unpaid in any such mortgage which has been assigned to the farm-loan registrar shall be subordinate to the existing lien of the bank for the balance of the indebtedness then or thereafter to become due under the terms of such mortgage; but the Farm Loan Commissioner may require the bank to furnish additional collateral as security for such loan if such collateral is available to the bank.

(d) The Farm Loan Commissioner is authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this section and to make the relief contemplated immediately available.

TITLE III. LOANS TO FARMERS BY FARM LOAN COMMISSIONER

REDUCTION OF DEBTS AND REDEMPTION OF FORECLOSED FARMS

SEC. 301. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed to allocate and make available to the Farm Loan Commissioner the sum of $300,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be used for the purpose of making loans as hereinafter provided to any farmer, secured by a first or second mortgage upon the whole or any part of the farm property, real or personal, including crops, of the farmer. The amount of the mortgage given by any farmer, together with all prior mortgages or other evidences of indebtedness secured by such farm property of the farmer, shall not exceed 75 percent of the value thereof, as determined upon an appraisal made pursuant to the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended; nor shall a loan in excess of $5,000 be made to any one farmer. Every mortgage made under this section shall contain an agreement providing for the repayment of the loan on an amortization plan by means of a fixed number of annual or semiannual installments, sufficient to cover (1) interest on unpaid principal at a rate not to exceed 5 percent per annum and (2) such payments equal in amount to be applied on principal as will extinguish the debt within an agreed period of not more than 10 years from the date the first payment on principal is due: Provided, That during the first 3 years the loan is in effect payments of interest only may be required. No loan shall be made under this section unless the holder of any prior mortgage or instrument of indebtedness secured by such farm property arranges to the satisfaction of the Farm Loan Commissioner to limit his right to proceed against the farmer and such farm property for default in payment of principal. Loans under this section shall be made for the following purposes only: (1) Refinancing, either in connection with proceedings under chapter VIII of the Bankruptcy Act of July 1, 1898, as amended (relating to agricultural compositions and extensions), or otherwise, any indebtedness, secured or unsecured, of the farmer, (2) providing working capital for his farm operations, and (3) enabling any farmer to redeem and/or repurchase farm property owned by him and occupied by him as a home prior to the loss of such property by him by the passage of title under foreclosure sale, sale by trustee under a deed of trust, or voluntary alienation in satisfaction of a preexisting mortgage indebtedness, which has occurred within 2 years prior to the date of enactment of this act or which occurs on, or after, the date of enactment of this act. The provisions of paragraph "Ninth" of section 13 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (relating to charges to applicants for loans and borrowers from the Federal land banks), shall, so far as practicable, apply to loans made under this section. As used in this section, the term "farmer" means any individual who is bona fide engaged in farming operations, either personally or through an agent or tenant, or the principal part of whose income is derived from farming operations, and includes a personal representative of a deceased farmer.

REGULATIONS

SEC. 302. The Farm Loan Commissioner is authorized to make such rules and regulations and to appoint such agents as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act and to make the relief contemplated by this act immediately available.

FACILITIES OF FEDERAL LAND BANKS AND NATIONAL FARM-LOAN ASSOCIATIONS MADE AVAILABLE

SEC. 303. The Federal land banks and the national farm-loan associations are authorized, upon request of the Farm Loan Commissioner, to make available to him their services and facilities to aid in administering the provisions of this act.

PENALTIES

SEC. 304. Any person who shall knowingly make any material false representation for the purpose of obtaining any loan under this title, or in assisting in obtaining any such loan, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than 6 months, or both.

TITLE IV. REFINANCING OF AGRICULTURAL IMPROVEMENT DISTRICT INDEBTEDNESS FOR THE BENEFIT OF FARMERS

LOANS BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

SEC. 401. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans as hereinafter provided, in an aggregate amount not exceeding $50,000,000, to drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation districts, and similar districts, duly organized under the laws of any State, and to political subdivisions of States, which, prior to the date of enactment of this act, have completed projects devoted chiefly to the improvement of land for agricultural purposes. Such loans shall be made for the purpose of enabling any such district or political subdivision (hereafter referred to as the "borrower") to reduce and refinance its outstanding indebtedness incurred in connection with any such project, and shall be subject to the same terms and conditions as loans made under section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended; except that (1) the term of any such loan shall not exceed 40 years; (2) each such loan shall be secured by refunding bonds issued to the Corporation by the borrower which are a lien on the real property within the project or on the amount of the assessments levied on such property by the borrower pursuant to State law, or by such other collateral as may be acceptable to the Corporation; (3) the borrower shall agree not to issue during the term of the loan any bonds so secured except with the consent of the Corporation; (4) the borrower shall pay to the Corporation, until all bonds of the borrower held by the Corporation are retired, an amount equal to the amount by which the assessments against the real property within the project collected by the borrower exceed the costs of operation and maintenance of the project and interest on its outstanding obligations; and (5) the borrower shall agree to the satisfaction of the Corporation to reduce the outstanding indebtedness to the borrower of the landowners within such project by an amount corresponding to that by which the indebtedness of the borrower is reduced by reason of the operation of this section, to distribute the amount of such reduction among such landowners on a pro rata basis, to cancel and retire its outstanding bonds in an aggregate amount equal to the amount of the reduction so distributed, and to permit the Corporation, in the case of the payment of the bonds of the borrower or the liquidation of such project, to participate in such payment or in the proceeds of such liquidation on the basis of the face amount of the bonds so retired plus the face amount of the bonds held by the Corporation as security for the loan. No loan shall be made under this section until the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (A) has caused an appraisal to be made of the property securing and/or underlying the outstanding bonds of the applicant, (B) has determined that the project of the applicant is economically sound, and (C) has been satisfied that an agreement has been entered into between the applicant and the holders of its outstanding bonds under which the applicant will be able to purchase or refund such bonds at a price determined by the Corporation to be reasonable after taking into consideration the average market price of such bonds over the 6 months' period ending March 1, 1933, and under which a substantial reduction will be brought about in the amount of the outstanding indebtedness of the applicant. This section shall not be construed or administered so as to make any land within any project of a borrower subject, without the consent of the landowner, to a lien for the payment of a greater proportion of the indebtedness of the borrower as compared with the other lands in the project than such land is subject to under existing law. As used in this section the term "State" includes Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico.

INCREASE OF LENDING POWER OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

SEC. 402. In order to provide funds to carry out the purposes of this act, the amount of notes, debentures, bonds, or other such obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered under section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, to have outstanding at any one time, is hereby increased by $300,000,000.

FUNCTIONS OF FARM LOAN COMMISSIONER UNDER EXECUTIVE ORDERS

SEC. 403. If and when any Executive order heretofore transmitted to the Congress pursuant to title IV of part II of the Legislative Appropriation Act of 1933, as amended, shall become effective, all functions, powers, authority, and duties conferred upon or vested in the Farm Loan Commissioner by this act shall be held and exercised by him subject to all the terms and conditions in any such Executive order the same as if such functions, powers, authority, and duties were specifically named in such Executive order or orders.

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 404. This act may be cited as the "Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 4 hours, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE] is recognized for 4 hours.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, this, it seems to me, is preeminently a time for action. This measure is but one of a series of steps which the administration has asked be taken in the struggle with this emergency. Standing alone it might not anything like accomplish the purpose that is desired. But I have every hope that with the other steps that have been and will be taken, we may find ourselves on the upswing. I am glad that we have a man in the White House who is unafraid [applause], who is willing to take responsibility, and who has a program. In this emergency I am not willing to block any of his steps on anything that does not involve fundamentals. I do not want the charmed circle to be broken; I want to give him every opportunity to work out of the condition that he has shown a disposition to go to the front upon. [Applause.]

It is probable that practically every Member of this House who has any farm section in his district has some ideas about what a farm-mortgage bill should include. I have some of my own. I know a number of other Members who do. We could spend a year discussing the program and probably never get concerted action. As a matter of fact, for the past 2 or 3 years there has been enough discussion on the floor of this House to fill volumes. Now we are going to try to have action on a bill.

Let no one deceive you; this bill will do a tremendous amount of good. There are $8,500,000,000 of farm mortgages in the United States, speaking in round numbers, and $3,500,000,000 in other debts owed by the farmers. The average interest rate on farm mortgages in the United States is 6.1 percent. If that could be reduced 1 percent even over a period of 20 years, it would mean a saving to the farmers of $2,000,000,000. If it were reduced 1½ percent, they would be saved considerably more than that. If the principal also is reduced, that will be an additional great advantage.

I shall take up this bill now and discuss it section by section and undertake to tell you just what it proposes to do and what it undertakes to accomplish. Gentlemen who have copies of the bill may, if they wish, follow me in the discussion. Title I of the bill provides for the issuance of not to exceed $2,000,000,000 in bonds by the Federal land banks at a rate of interest not to exceed 4 percent, with the interest on those bonds unconditionally guaranteed by the United States Government. Those bonds are to be issued for the purpose of reducing the principal and interest, one or both, of outstanding mortgages, both in and out of the Federal Land Bank System.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I prefer not to now. I want to finish the explanation, because I may during the discussion cover some of the things the gentleman or other gentlemen might want to inquire about. I shall ask the House to excuse me from interruption until I have finished a general explanation of the bill.

Section 1 of the bill provides that those bonds, when issued, may be sold upon the best terms possible. The money thus obtained is to be used, as provided in section 2, to reduce the principal or interest, or both, of outstanding mortgages, or those bonds may be traded for outstanding mortgages of all kinds and of every character, whether held by insurance companies or individuals. Twenty-three percent of those mortgages are held by insurance companies, 12 percent by the Federal land banks, 7 percent by the joint-stock land banks, 29 percent by individuals, 11 percent by commercial banks, and about 10 percent by mortgage companies. All of those mortgages will have a chance to come under the terms of this measure. In this particular title we use the Federal land bank as the method of approach. In some instances the principal can be reduced very greatly. The principal may be reduced as much as possible in a trade between the mortgagor and mortgagee and the representative of the bank. It is hoped that in many instances the principal of the mortgages may be very materially reduced and that the interest rates may also be reduced. There are other sections of the bill which deal in a different fashion with those things.

Section 3 provides for the handling of mortgages in cases in which the mortgage is well secured. Of course in a case of that kind there is no way to force a refinancing, by any sort of a bill that you might present. It is up to the mortgagee and there is no way to force him to do that. However, there are certain of those well-secured mortgages where there is a delinquency at the present time in taxes or in installments, principal or interest, or in all three. This particular section provides for granting an extension of payment to farm borrowers in the Federal land banks, and provides an appropriation of $50,000,000 to take care of the necessary expense incident to granting those extensions of payment of principal and interest, and in taking care of taxes. The extensions may be at any time within a period of 5 years.

Section 4 makes provision that the maximum rate of interest for a period of 5 years on all outstanding old and new mortgages in the Federal land banks shall be reduced to a rate not exceeding 4½ percent. I call attention to the fact that the measure uses the term "not exceeding." If we are able to sell any of those bonds which shall bear a rate of interest not to exceed 4 percent at a less rate of interest, that reduction must be carried forward into the loans and the borrower must get the benefit of it. Likewise, if the Federal land bank takes over a mortgage of $5,000 and pays only $3,000 for it, as it may be able to do in some instances, the farmer then must, under the terms of this bill, be given the benefit of having his mortgage reduced to a $3,000 basis. You may say that will not help. I believe it will.

Some complain of these rates of interest. We have to finance farms over a long period of time, and we must get the money from somewhere. The home owners in the cities must have a similar bill. If we are able to get an upswing and get better commodity prices, which I believe is a part of the program and which I believe will result—and God help us if it does not—then they will be able to pay the rates of interest provided in this bill even though the maximum rate should prevail. If we cannot carry through the program—and a wonderful amount of confidence has been instilled in the American people through the accomplishment of the present Chief of the United States—if the program is blocked, they could not even pay 2 percent. In fact, if we do not have an upturn for the better over what has happened in the last 2 years it would not make much difference what the rate of interest is. This must be part of a program that restores America. I personally have my own personal belief about many things. For instance, I believe in liberalizing the currency. [Applause.]

An adequate amount of currency on a sound basis, to use the expression of the President in his first message, would do much to give us restoration, but certainly if that should come, if that should be a part of the orderly program that is being worked out, then if we have a measure by means of which the farmer may get rid of the immediate pressing debt that threatens foreclosure upon him, he can work his way toward daylight. If we do not do something of this character, then some mortgage companies may use that as a means of foreclosing when they see the upswing coming.

You may say we ought to have a lower rate. You can throw a wreckage program into the machine; as for me I would rather get a bill which I believe will accomplish great good and relieve this condition than to fight for something better and get nothing.

Under the terms of this section the interest rate on all of the outstanding mortgages in the Federal Land Bank System is reduced to 4.5 percent for a 5-year period, and provision is made for paying the land banks the loss which they have on their outstanding bonds, about one half of 1 percent. The average outstanding land-bank bond draws 4½ percent. They range from 4 percent to around 5 percent. Under the terms of this section not only will that interest rate be reduced but no borrower in the system will be compelled to pay anything on the principal for a period of 5 years. I believe that would help. We certainly hope that conditions will get better during that period. All the borrower will be compelled to pay is his interest and his taxes. He will not have to pay anything on the principal during that period. It seems to me that would be of material assistance.

Section 5 provides that the maximum limit of Federal land-bank loans shall be raised from $25,000 to $50,000. You understand that this bill provides for liquidation of the joint-stock land banks which were permitted to loan up to $50,000. This rate is made discretionary, and must have the approval, in the individual case, of the Farm Loan Commissioner, but it enables the land banks to take that little field of loans, small in number but sometimes very important, which have been heretofore occupied by the joint-stock land banks in their ordinary set-up.

Section 6 provides for making direct loans to farmers rather than through farm-loan associations. It provides for making new loans as well as for the refinancing of the old loans. We made a change over the terms of the original suggestion, which required that all borrowers join a farm-loan association. We changed that to make it permissive so that a borrower may join an association or remain on the outside and secure an individual loan. He pays one half of 1 percent higher on a direct loan than on a loan through an association. In some sections they would rather do that. At least, I believe the farmer will be better pleased if it is made voluntary if he wishes to go in on that character of an obligation.

Section 7 provides for loans to receivers by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in order to enable them to handle the orderly affairs of the banks which are in receiverships. There are three joint-stock banks in receiverships at the present time, and, of course, it is essential for some sort of a loan to pay taxes on their farm real estate. They are simply made eligible for loans in carrying that out.

Title II, page 12, of the bill provides for the orderly liquidation of the joint-stock land-bank system, and they are going out of business. Section 201 provides that the joint-stock land banks may not issue any more tax-exempt securities, and may make no more new loans, except such loans as are essential to the refinancing program of their own outstanding loans. In other words, it has stipulations that make liquidation necessary.

Under section 202 (a) the joint-stock banks are authorized to borrow $100,000,000 from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation on their outstanding mortgages, after appraisal, and at a rate not to exceed 60 per cent of the value of the land. This is to enable them to wind up their own affairs in an orderly way and in the best manner possible, and thus save themselves and their borrowers from as much loss as possible, as there will probably be losses to the stockholders as well as to the bondholders.

The committee put in an additional provision requiring the Farm Loan Commissioner to supervise and approve the plan of liquidation and see that these dealings are all fair to everyone involved, including the borrower, the bondholder, and the stock owner. Then it is required, as a condition to this loan, that all of the outstanding loans held by the joint-stock land banks shall be reduced to 5 percent. Their present rate of interest is 6 percent. Before they can get this loan from the Farm Loan Commissioner they must agree to reduce the interest on all of their outstanding loans to 5 percent for the life of the loan, and agree not to foreclose for a period of 2 years, except for abandonment or other unavoidable circumstances, to be passed upon by the Commissioner.

I am thoroughly convinced that that is better than to force them into receivership.

Section 203 (a), immediately following, provides that they may borrow a portion of this $100,000,000, without the necessity of appraisal. They may borrow for the purpose of taking care of immediate taxes, immediate delinquent installments of principal and interest on their borrowers' obligations. The limit, however, on what they may borrow for the outstanding principal is 5 percent, and the total they may borrow for all purposes under this section, without appraisement, is 25 percent of the unpaid principal of any mortgage. So it is figured that would be amply sufficient to provide security for the borrowings that may be made from the Farm Loan Commissioner.

Title III, in the thought of many, is a matter of tremendous importance. It provides for $300,000,000 appropriation to make first or second mortgage loans in sums not exceeding $5,000 for the purpose of taking up other mortgages, for the purpose of taking up, in some instances, outstanding minor indebtedness that might crimp the farmer in his operations, even though his farm mortgages were refinanced on a scaled-down basis.

It is hoped that the ones who are administering these loans will be able to get in touch with the mortgagor and the mortgagee or other holders of outstanding indebtedness, and say, "Now, if you here holding a $5,000 mortgage will reduce it to $4,000, and if you fellows on the outside will reduce the little running indebtedness that you have in several forms from $600 to $300, the Government will let you take this $4,000 mortgage provided you reduce the interest rate to 3 percent, 3½ percent, or 4 percent", whatever trade they are able to make, "and the Government will take a second mortgage of $500 or $1,000." So the original mortgage will be reduced to $3,000 or $3,500, as the case may be. Thus with a small amount of money we can refinance a tremendous amount of mortgages.

This provision was put in the bill largely because of the work which the unofficial group, as it is sometimes called here in the House, has done. It has made a study of this subject many times. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] presented a paper to the House which covered this feature. It is very interesting to take one of his analyses and follow it through. I shall ask that his analyses covering a $10,000 loan and a $5,000 loan, showing the saving to the farmer through the taking of a small second lien, be placed in the RECORD. We will take, for example, a $5,000——

Mr. BUCHANAN. Ten thousand dollars.

Mr. JONES. I am cutting yours in half for the purpose of the illustration. I shall put all this in the RECORD.

The $5,000 mortgage is cut to $4,000, with the interest rate cut from 6 percent to 4 percent. Of course, these figures would have to be changed a little under the terms of the bill, because the second mortgage would carry with it a 5-percent rate, but it would be a small amount.

The Government loans the farmer $1,000 to make a further reduction in principal from $4,000 to $3,000, charging the farmer 4 percent per annum on the loan and taking a second mortgage of $1,000.

The farmer agrees to amortization payment at the rate of 1 percent per annum to liquidate the Government loan of $1,000 and reduced principal of $3,000.

Result: Interest charge over period of 20 years on present mortgage of $5,000 at 6 percent per annum, $6,000. This is the interest charge based on the assumption for the purpose of illustration that it would be a 20-year loan.

Interest charge over a period of 20 years on reduced mortgage of $3,000 ("a" and "b" at 4 percent per annum), $2,400.

Interest charge over period of 20 years on Government loan of $1,000 at 4 percent per annum, $800, $3,200.

Saving to former in interest payments, $2,800.

As a matter of fact, I have every hope that when this bill is finally enacted into law the insurance companies and the mortgage companies will meet the interest rates and make a saving to the farmer and the Government. I do not know whether they will do it, but I hope they will. This action on their part would save the Government some of the refinancing.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman reached that part in his discussion where it will be agreeable for a Member to propound a question?

Mr. JONES. I am not through with my explanation, but I will yield.

Mr. COX. Is not the gentleman impressed that this bill as written simply sells the mortgaged farmer into bondage to the money lender for all time to come?

Mr. JONES. No; I do not think so.

Mr. COX. That no farm loan financing legislation answers the farmers' needs which does not make certain that there will be drastic reduction of the mortgage debt.

Mr. JONES. We had an illustration before the committee of the operation of how section 2 of the bill would operate. A man said he had $10,000 against his farm; that the man who held it was willing to take $6,000. Under this section of the bill this bank could take up that mortgage and would be forced, under the loan provision of section 2, to give the farmer the benefit of the $4,000 reduction and the reduced interest rate as well. When this was explained to him he was perfectly happy.

Mr. COX. But did not the gentleman state in his explanation of the bill that it gave little promise of certainty of reduction of principal and interest?

Mr. JONES. Oh, no. I think it gives almost certain promise in the great stream of outstanding mortgages of a reduction of principal, a material reduction of principal on the outstanding mortgages on a vast number of the mortgages held in this country, and on at least 80 percent a material reduction of principal as well as of interest.

I had not finished this illustration. It illustrates how the plan as worked out by the group could be handled. In addition to the $2,800 that would be saved on the $5,000 mortgage there would be, I read—

Plus saving on present amortization payment of 1 percent on $1,000 by which present mortgage is to be reduced, $200.

Mr. COX. That is the reduction in interest.

Mr. JONES. Let me finish.

Mr. COX. Is there in the bill something that makes reduction of principal and interest certain?

Mr. JONES. I cannot yield further at this time; I do not want this illustration to be interrupted. Plus saving in reduction of principal from $5,000 to $4,000 is $1,000. Total saving in principal, interest, and amortization, $4,000. Bear in mind that this is a saving on a $5,000 mortgage over a period of 20 years.

Now, if this is not worth something, I am deceived about the matter, and I may say to the gentleman that there is not anything in this measure that forces anybody to take advantage of its provisions or to come within its terms. It offers a haven of refuge for the distressed farmer who, through the last few years, has been forced from his home under foreclosure and trustee sale, or who has been forced to make a voluntary transference in order to avoid trustee sales.

Mr. HASTINGS. Would it interrupt the gentleman for one who is sympathetic with all the purposes of the bill to make an inquiry about this section?

Mr. JONES. I will be pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to invite the gentleman's attention to subparagraph (2), at the bottom of page 17, with respect to loans that are to be made by the Farm Loan Commissioner out of the $300,000,000 fund, where it says that—

Such payments equal in amount to be applied on principal as will extinguish the debt within an agreed period of not more than 10 years from the date the first payment on principal is due.

I should like for the gentleman and his committee to consider whether or not this ought not to be extended for a longer period. Remember that in the preceding lines an interest rate of 5 percent is charged and this amortization is to be within 10 years. So you would have to charge the borrower 10 percent a year amortization, which added to the 5 percent interest, would make 15 percent per annum he would have to pay, and I very much fear that the borrower would be unable to make so large an annual payment. Am I correct in my statement?

Mr. JONES. No. I may say to the gentleman that there has been discussion of whether that should be 10 years or longer. It is a frequent practice as to a second mortgage to have it become due before the first mortgage. The second mortgage is supposed to be very much smaller, and in the illustration which I gave, it would be a small mortgage for the purpose of inducing the original mortgage holder to reduce his principal and his interest on the first mortgage very materially. He could reduce both just as much as he wanted to.

Mr. HASTINGS. I did not read the provision as applying only to second mortgages. I read it as being the amount that could be advanced by the Farm Loan Commissioner on both first and second mortgages.

Mr. JONES. No; if he makes the first-mortgage loan it is 5 percent; but it is hoped that much of this will be handled through either the scaling-down of these outside debts or through the taking-over of a small second mortgage in order to beat down the principal and the interest on the original mortgage.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then the gentleman construes this amortization provision at the top of page 18 as applying only to the payment of loans secured by second mortgage?

Mr. JONES. It applies to both.

Mr. HASTINGS. And not to the first mortgages that may be made?

Mr. JONES. No; the first mortgage may be left at 40 years if it is held by the original holder. If the whole mortgage is taken up, it would have to be for 10 years. If the whole mortgage is taken up, it would have to come under another feature of the bill if the amount loaned was more than $5,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman then construes section 301 to have that effect?

Mr. JONES. Yes. There is nothing to keep the original mortgage holder, if it is a private mortgage company or an individual, from extending it to any length of time he wants to.

Mr. TARVER and Mr. KNUTSON rose.

Mr. TARVER. I regret I did not hear the early part of the gentleman's discussion.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman allow me, then, to finish my statement?

Mr. TARVER. The question which I have in mind is one which is apropos at this point, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. JONES. All right; I yield.

Mr. TARVER. I was interested in the gentleman's remarks concerning the possibility of reduction of the principal of mortgages. The gentleman has reference, of course, to the mortgages that are privately owned. As I understand the bill, and I have not had opportunity to study it carefully, there is no way by which the mortgagor, who has obtained a loan from the Federal land bank, could possibly obtain any reduction in the amount of principal owed by him.

Mr. JONES. There is no provision in the measure itself for a reduction of the principal on a Federal land-bank loan, but there is a provision for reducing the interest rate to not to exceed 4½ percent and that the principal shall not be required to be paid for a period of 5 years.

Mr. TARVER. Does the gentleman think it is fair, in effect, for the Government to go to private mortgagees and say, "You ought to sell your mortgages to the Government for 50 percent of the value of the land and 20 percent of the value of the improvements, and yet we are not going to allow reduced principal of Federal land-bank loans in cases where an equal percentage of values would be less than the mortgages"?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman may criticize the Federal system all he pleases——

Mr. TARVER. I am not criticizing.

Mr. JONES. But many mortgage companies in my country, after the establishment of the land-bank system, reduced the interest rate, and I suppose in the gentleman's country as well, from 8 percent to 6 percent.

Mr. TARVER. I am not speaking in a critical way at all.

Mr. JONES. Of course, most of the Federal land-bank mortgages are on a better basis, and this would reduce their rate of interest, and, surely, the gentleman would not object to some of these mortgages being scaled down.

Mr. TARVER. I am not antagonistic to the gentleman's bill. I am seeking information, and I trust the gentleman will be patient and will give me such information as he may have.

Mr. JONES. I wish I had the time, but I have promised practically every minute of my outstanding time, and I will explain the matter to the gentleman personally, if I may, after this is over.

Mr. TARVER. The gentleman has secured here a rule which prohibits the offering of amendment, and yet he will not talk to a Member, who is not antagonistic to the bill, about one of its most important provisions.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman surely would not expect me to go ahead when I have promised my time to others. There are 25 members of the committee, and I am sure they will be able to answer the gentleman's question, and I shall do so at a later time, if I may.

I will not have time to explain the provisions of title IV about improvement districts, but there are others who have had the privilege of studying this subject, and they are more familiar with it. It simply enables them to make loans for a scale-down to enable the landowners within the district to come within the terms of this bill.

Now I want to say this: I believe that this bill will do a tremendous amount of good. I want to help break the shackles from the farmer who is in debt. I do not want to make credit easy. Credit has been too easy heretofore. I want to make the interest rate as low as possible. I believe we will be able to reduce it more in the future. And in the main I hope that the farmer may in the future cut down his indebtedness instead of increasing it. The only way to have a free people is to have a people who are as far as possible unencumbered. [Applause.]

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Does the gentleman believe that we are helping the American farmer by providing for $2,000,000,000 in tax-exempt securities?

Mr. JONES. Personally, I feel that all tax-exempt securities should be abolished for all the future. But they have been issued for many other purposes, and so long as the system is in vogue I do not feel that we should discriminate against the farmer.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may need.

I think the chairman of the committee, Mr. JONES, has explained this bill and its general purposes as well as anybody can. I do not believe there is a single member of the Agricultural Committee, I do not believe there is a member of the farm experts board that inhabits the Department of Agriculture who helped draw this bill who is fully cognizant of and understands the full significance and full import of this bill.

If you will read the discussions in the Senate of only yesterday, you will find that Mordecai Ezekiel, one of the authors of this bill, has gone into the ramifications of higher mathematics in an effort to explain its philosophy, to the extent that it is absolutely impossible for those at the other end of this great institution we call the Congress of the United States to understand.

I intend to elaborate on only two features, one is on the mortgage feature of this bill and the other is on the development of American agriculture and legislation relating to American agriculture.

According to my theory the history of American agriculture can readily be classified into two great periods or epochs. One is ancient agriculture that is typified by individualism personified, if you please, independence glorified, isolation complete, except Sunday at church when neighbors would have time between two sermons for a brief visit. This ancient farmer plowed his fields in haughty contempt of his fellow men, pursued his lonely life, inflicted it upon his family, and lived it irrespective of everybody and everything.

Now as to modern agriculture, I love to think of the universally beloved Lincoln as the pioneer soul and the man of vision who laid the foundation for what I picture as modern agriculture.

If you will turn back in your history of agriculture, you will find that it was in 1862 that a department of government known as the Department of Agriculture was established under Abraham Lincoln. It was also at that time that President Lincoln signed the Hatch Acts, having to do with the great western domain, and resolving back the proceeds of sales of those millions of acres in the West, under a dedication of service to American agriculture through the Hatch Acts and the Morrill Acts and land-grant colleges that followed it, which were the groundwork in their foundation and development, and these colleges, in turn, have made their great national contribution to our American agriculture.

In the underlying evolution of that great Agriculture Department and of the land-grant colleges, along came the extension work itself; and this extension work, if you please, under the Smith-Lever Act and the Purnell Act and other acts, has now reached out so far in its ramifications that it touches practically and brings to every farm home of this country the benefits of investigation, the benefits of the agricultural facts of the whole world, to educate our farmers on world conditions in relation to what they produce. More than that, in the development of modern agriculture there has also come what we of the farm sections hold to be the greatest development of all, namely, the development of the farm home and the recognition of the farm home as a unit in the consideration of things in agriculture. I mean by that that the isolated independent farmer has largely disappeared, and in his place has come a recognition of the fact by the farmer and his Government that the farmer, his wife, and his children are all part and parcel of the great common enterprise that we call modern agriculture.

As the national picture of agriculture developed and grew and the usefulness of government enlarged, many agencies have been set up to help develop usefulness in the service of the Government of the United States through its efforts to bring equality, no more and no less, to agriculture.

What are some of these agencies? I shall point out only a few of them. There are the Federal land banks, the joint-stock land banks, the intermediate-credit banks, the warehouse system that provides for orderly assembling in many portions of the United States of products close to the source of production, in order that they may be orderly sent out into the markets when the markets need them, and the great marketing agencies that advise when those products of the farmers may be shipped. So I say there have been great developments in the picture of usefulness and service to agriculture of Government agencies, because, after all, we recognize that agriculture is a great fundamental industry affecting 6,000,000 of homes and a population of practically 30,000,000 people, and why should not our Government do its duty? However, a lot of abuses have crept up in the agencies in the development of this picture and in the Federal contribution sought to be made.

A great number of philosophies have sought to be developed and translated in law regarding modern agriculture and the duty that is imposed on the Congress of the Nation in giving equality, no more and no less, to agriculture. Do not forget, that is all that we on the great Agriculture Committee are demanding for agriculture—equality; no more and no less. What are these philosophies, and what are some of the theories they have sought to translate into law?

In the first place, we have the old "equalization-fee" theory, which is one of the first things that confronted me when I came to Congress 12 years ago. What is it the Congress sought to accomplish through that law? They sought in their way to make the benefits of the tariff reflect themselves back to the products and producers thereof, the exportable part of the products that our farmers produce in this country. That was all right in theory; but when you come down to the practical effect of the application of the "equalization fee", you found that the encouragement for farm production, the stimulation of that "equalization fee", was bound to create and pile up surpluses, surpluses, and surpluses; and that act was vetoed, though twice passed by the Congress of the United States, by President Coolidge.

Then we come to the second school of thought regarding what the Congress of the United States should do for agriculture in order to bring about agricultural equality, no more and no less, and I want to emphasize that. The theory underlying the export-debenture plan and the philosophy behind it was that it was a bounty in the form of a debenture on the commodity exported, the debenture to be used to pay the import duty on some other product coming in—a way to bring up farm-commodity prices; and again it was thought by those who were in control of legislation that through that very process you would again encourage overproduction and therefore ultimately break down the price fabric and structure of our agricultural commodities. That failed of being written into law.

The third great philosophy that was developed and which became the law of this country was known as the Agricultural Marketing Act. The first objective of that Marketing Act was to assist the cooperative movement in this country, to enable the farmers of the country to have the benefits of all the information that could be assembled by the great Department of Agriculture, and the land-grant colleges, and give to the cooperatives their fair chance in competing in the markets not alone in this country but in the markets of the world where they had an exportable surplus.

Along with it was the so-called "stabilization plan." There is nobody who, in the light of experience, could stand up and defend the stabilization plan today, but for 10 years no great farm leader ever appeared before the Committee on Agriculture, urging a stabilization plan, who did not also impress upon the committee that if they could control and delay the marketing of the product from the time they began cutting and harvesting wheat, for instance, in Oklahoma and Texas, until it got up to the Canadian line, and not hurry the marketing of that product, 10 to 12 cents per bushel could be saved to the producers. Listening to plea after plea of these farm leaders, who have helped crucify this Cooperative Marketing Act today, we set up that power, Bill, Sam, and other farm leaders, if you want exact names, alleged friends of the farmer, claiming to be the pioneers and leaders in behalf of the farmers, yet crucifying them and destroying an agency of Government, and breaking down the good faith of the Government itself in trying to do this job of backing the cooperative effort.

So I say to those farm leaders, and I would make it stronger than parliamentary language will permit, "If you will get the hell out of this picture in this country of ours and leave the Congress and the Senate to do what it sensibly ought to do, we can help frame legislation that will help the farmer"; but as long as such unwise leaders are running around over the country, throwing the fear of God into a lot of people, going back into the districts and, through their influence, literally compelling some of the Representatives into doing what they know ought not to be done, such leaders are proving false to the great farmer himself who is paying them to represent him, and untrue to representative government itself.

Now, my friends, let us look into the cooperative movement. I claim to know something about that movement. For 7 years I have been director of the second largest cooperative in the United States. What is the theory behind the Federal Government's backing the cooperative movement? I will tell you. If the farmers themselves are unwilling to go into the cooperative organization on the commodity they produce, to help fight their own battle and to not lean upon the Federal Government any more than is necessary, what right have they to appeal to their Government?

I say if the farmer is not willing to go into his own cooperative organization on the commodity he produces, federate nationally, and help fight his own battle, how can he expect the Congress of the United States to take him by the seat of the pants and lift him into economic prosperity? The good Lord will not save those unwilling to do their part. Many of those leaders in the cooperative movement have been false; they have betrayed their trust. If you want, I will give you some examples of it.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks. I want you to know something about what has been going on with a fund ($500,000,000 for Farm Board), that I hold was as sacred a fund as was ever created by the taxpayers' money and dedicated to the cause of giving equality to agriculture, no more and no less.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FEDERAL FARM BOARD,
Washington, March 30, 1933.

Hon. JOHN D. CLARKE,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CLARKE: Complying with the request contained in your letter of March 29, there is given below a tabulation showing all loans made by the Federal Farm Board to cooperative associations in the State of New York, which tabulation shows total advances, total repayments, unpaid balances, and interest rates applicable thereto:

Names and addresses of associations	Total advances	Total repayments	Balance outstanding	Interest rate
Dairymens League Cooperative, Inc., New York, N.Y.	$3,600,000.00	----------	$3,600,000.00	2¾

Trusting that the information contained herein is sufficient for your needs, I am,

Sincerely yours,

HENRY MORGENTHAU, Jr., Chairman.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. What happens? The minute those farm leaders came into the picture and had a chance to get hold of a lot of that cheap money at an unfair interest rate they utilized and abused it for selfish advantage; they plunged into the hog trough, hook, line, and sinker; and they have done an irrevocable wrong to the great farm movement and brought discredit on the Cooperative Marketing Act. I say they are more guilty than anybody else of crucifying it.

You want another example? Very well. Out in Chicago there is a farm organization known as the Farmers' National Grain Corporation, which saw this $500,000,000, and with somebody on the Farm Board cooperating, conspiring with them to defeat the high purpose of the holy fund that had been set up for national cooperative movement, what did they do? They borrowed $15,500,000 at one eighth of 1 percent and paid someone a salary of $50,000. Is that at all fair? Is that playing fair with the taxpayers? Is that playing fair with the cooperative movement? Is that playing fair with the fund that was created for this purpose by the taxpayers? I say to you that they are betrayers of a holy trust, and as far as I am concerned I should like to banish them all from the great farm picture.

I have received permission to put into the RECORD some of the doings of other cooperatives in my own State of New York, to show that they too have tried to get next to this fund, and to set up competition that is absolutely unfair, financed by money which was borrowed at less than they could borrow it in the ordinary course of business.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Was not the Farmers Grain Corporation in Chicago set up by the Farm Board?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. That is it exactly. That is the conspiracy I am talking about. The Farm Board was in conspiracy with these alleged farm leaders to get that fund, and they tied it up for 10 years at one eighth of 1 percent.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. And did not the Farm Board acquiesce in paying the head of that concern $75,000 a year when he had never earned $10,000 in his life before?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Yes.

Now, I say that is only a part of the picture.

I have put into the RECORD a statement of what our cooperatives in the State of New York are doing. Some of that is wrong. After all, the Government is not called upon to finance any cooperative at a lower rate of interest than it is paying for its money elsewhere; and in the second place, they have been financing competition with legitimate business. That is a fundamental principle. If that is not sound, when I get through with my little story I shall be glad to answer any questions about it, but that is the experience we have had with this thing. So I say a lot of our farm leaders have helped crucify this cooperative movement.

Now, regarding the mortgage situation, this Roosevelt bill, as I call it—and that is what it is, my friends, no more and no less—seeks to alleviate, not cure, the farm situation by issuing $2,000,000,000 worth of 4 percent Federal bonds with the interest guaranteed to help lighten the burden of interest to these giving farm mortgages. It is going to do some good, but let me ask, Where is the farmer who cannot pay his taxes going to get any money to help pay interest? [Applause.]

Just how serious and to how many of our farm homes does this mortgage problem apply? According to testimony before our committee 58 percent of the farms in this country are not mortgaged. So we are seeking to apply the remedy to 42 percent of the farms, for this is the percentage of the farms that are mortgaged. Those of you who have not studied this problem will want to know how the mortgages are arranged geographically. The 12 North Central States, that means out in the Middle West, have 59½ percent of the total farm-mortgage debt of the United States; the North Atlantic States, 6.8 percent; the South Atlantic States, 5.5 percent; the South Central States, 13.7 percent; and the Western States, 14.5 percent. This makes up the 100 percent of the 42 percent—keep that in mind, 42 percent of the farms, the ones which have this mortgage debt.

Fifty-six percent of the 42 percent of this mortgage debt is on farms operated by owners; 40 percent of the 42 percent of this mortgage debt is on farms operated by tenants; 4 percent of the 42 percent of this mortgage debt is on farms operated by managers.

Who are the creditors? Because I do not want to tire you with figures I shall put in the RECORD a detailed statement of the classes of lenders and the debt.

Who are the creditors?

Classes of lenders	Per cent	Millions of dollars
Federal land banks	12.1	1,146
Joint-stock land banks	7.0	667
Commercial banks	10.8	1,020
Mortgage companies	10.4	988
Insurance companies	22.9	2,164
Retired farmers	10.6	1,006
Active farmers	3.6	339
Other individuals	15.4	1,453
Other agencies	7.2	685
Total	100.0	9,468

This one fact stands out, that there are in this country today 750,000 individual creditors in this farm-mortgage picture. Some of them are active farmers; some of them are retired farmers; others are widows; and many others have put their dollars into farm mortgages, believing, as we all believe, that, after all, a farm mortgage, a mortgage upon the real estate of this country, is the best security upon the face of God's earth, and these investors, thus believing, are looking to us for help. I am not one of the old-fashioned standpat farmers from the hills who believe the Lord is going to help us all. These people are looking to the Congress for help. They need it, and they need it now.

I believe there has been altogether too much credit given to too many people in this country. I believe this is responsible for at least half of the situation we find ourselves in now, whether we be farmers, independent investors, or others. Extravagant installment buying by farmers mostly helped make Henry Ford a billionaire and Raskob and his friends multimillionaires. In the first place, all of us had too much credit, and the result was when the breakdown came and the banks called on us, we were forced to liquidate at such prices as we could get. The banks were just as unscrupulous as any person who ever walked the streets of the hot spot below in seeking to force us all to liquidate, liquidate, liquidate.

Down in the Treasury the very agents and inspectors of the banks who for years had been looking into and checking up banks, both city banks and country banks in the little communities, were putting emphasis on liquidation. Their cry was liquidate! liquidate! liquidate! although time after time they had been in those very same banks and O.K.'d the identical securities they were now forcing those banks to get rid of at any old price. They, more than anybody else, have helped create the condition we are now in. [Applause.]

I think any fair-minded person in the world would go along with the objectives of this bill. I see over here Brother PIERCE. We call him "Governor" in the committee and love him. He comes from Oregon. He has had an awful time with his conscience, but it is not his conscience as much as it is the political promises he made that are hurting him. [Laughter.] Political promises are hurting a lot of the rest of you, because you have been promising to the farmers more than the farmer is entitled to. He is entitled to equality, no more, no less.

So I say that in the bill, as framed, there are a lot of things that are objectionable. They are objectionable to me in the first place because not a single man, not a single woman, or a single interest opposed to taking this bill as written has had 1 minute of time before the committee. Now, this is not the way sound legislation emanates, Mr. Chairman. It is not the way to write the best bill in the world. Let the other fellows come in, and if they can shoot your argument, or shoot your bill, full of holes, to the satisfaction of a majority of this Congress, what is wrong with giving them the opportunity to be heard and the Congress the right to vote upon their suggestions? [Applause.] So, I say, I do not like the atmosphere of the thing.

I will say this for that group, Mordecai Ezekiel did not present himself before our committee as an expert because he goes into higher mathematics and the rest of us cannot follow him, but the other people who came there from that group were a very fair-minded, able, outstanding group. I loved Secretary Wallace's father. He was my loyal friend, a guest at my farm and Mindale Farms, and my people loved him. His boy, the present Secretary, is proving a worthy son, keeping the high traditions of the Wallace family of Iowa.

To show that the policies of our Federal land banks are being materially changed I want to read this telegram from a boy who grew up in my home town. He is the president of the land bank up in Springfield, Mass., and is doing a mighty good job. Here is what he [Ed Thomson] says and you are entitled to the information because your conscience and your constituents are going to hold you responsible for whatever way you vote:

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

In connection with consideration of farm-mortgage measure you may be interested to know the Federal Land Bank of Springfield last year approved all applications that met requirements and made new loans of over three and one-third million dollars.

This is a farm boy who grew up on a farm up in my hills.

Most of these loans were for refunding local indebtedness, especially mortgages held by local savings and commercial banks, as few farmers are borrowing to enlarge their business. Federal land bank about the only source where farmer can get mortgage loan. Considering present low prices for agricultural products, farmer borrowers with about 50 millions in loans are meeting their installments in splendid shape, over two thirds of loans being in good standing and remaining asking for only very short extensions. Immediately following passage Fletcher-Steagall measure last Congress the bank granted all its borrowers privilege of deferring.

He is a good, fair-minded farmer boy up there who is applying the law with a few heart throbs.

Principal part of installment for year beginning April 1, but over 50 percent of borrowers are voluntarily continuing to pay full installment. Foreclosures are very few and instituted only as last resort where property is abandoned or the borrower indifferent and unwilling to work or had no possible chance of succeeding. Good demand for the few farms acquired with 53 sales in the last 6 weeks, which show little loss on bank's investment. As you know, the bank has endeavored to finance farmers here in the Northeastern States safely and constructively, with result that bank is rendering real service and is in good, sound condition today.

This is a Federal land bank, but if we turn the picture over a bit and if the Interstate Commerce Committee had the nerve and the times were right, the best job in the world that could be done with respect to some of these agencies—and I refer particularly to the joint-stock land banks—would be to take off the lid and show that some of these joint-stock land banks, with their high-pressure salesmen, falsely have been telling people that the Government was behind the securities they were issuing and in this way lent at least $400,000,000 and obtained money under false pretenses. The worst stinkpot you have is the joint-stock land bank proposition. [Applause.]

Now, as our chairman very fairly stated, this is not the bill that any of us, even on this committee, would draw for ourselves. It does not meet the situation of our country, as I view it, in a lot of ways, but so far as I am concerned it is the best we can get with the Democrats so overwhelmingly in the majority, so we cannot do any bargaining for better legislation. [Laughter.]

So I am going to go along. I am going to back the President and stand with my chairman and help him to perfect and pass this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER].

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I am glad indeed that we have before us today a bill the purpose of which is to relieve, in part at least, our agricultural lands from mortgage debts incurred during the days of prosperity. Our farm lands were mortgaged, and if commodity prices had continued as they were then, there would have been no trouble in paying it off. But when commodity prices dropped to about one fourth of what they were at the time the mortgage was made the farmer found himself in debt, with little hope of being able to even keep the interest paid, and sometimes could not do that, and his farm has been taken for the debt.

Forty-two percent of the agricultural lands are today under mortgage, and unless some relief can be given the lands will be lost to the farmer. When the farmer fails everything else fails. If you will put the farmers of the United States in a prosperous condition, you will solve every other problem. The wheels of industry would begin to turn, the railroads would have plenty to haul, railroad shops would be filled with working men, the banks would not be broke, and the merchant would again have business. The farmer could then take back some of the men who have left the farm and give them employment.

Today we have in the United States 15,000,000 men out of employment. The farm has in the past furnished 50 percent of the employment to men. It will not only do that again but will do more, if agriculture is taken care of. We have today 4,110,000 families, as shown by the records, receiving aid or some State agency relief. We must not let this condition continue. Nothing hurts the pride of the American citizen more than this, yet we know it has been brought about by a condition over which they had no control and by no fault of their own.

Counting the population of the United States at 120,000,000 people, and dividing the number of acres of land in the United States by this number, it will be a fraction over 15 acres per person. If this acreage is properly used, no one will ever suffer for bread.

We frequently hear it said that overproduction is our trouble. With the present methods of handling and marketing our farm products that may be true. But if the people had the buying power that they should have, I think it would soon be demonstrated that it was not so much overproduction as it was underconsumption.

This bill is not perfect, and it does not go far enough to give the entire relief needed. It provides relief up to $2,000,000,000. I hope the plan will work so well that relief will be given to all by a further advance under this plan. The lands now mortgaged to the joint-stock land banks and the Federal land banks can be refinanced under this bill and our valuable farm lands saved from foreclosure. This bill provides a plan, or, at least, holds out the hope that the mortgage debt may be scaled down to what is fair and just between the mortgagor and mortgagee.

The interest rate provided for is too high, but the rate of not exceeding 4½ percent will certainly help. I think 3 percent is high enough. I introduced a bill myself that I like better than this one; but it seems this is the best we can get now. The farm bill, if it accomplishes the purpose that we hope it will and believe it will, together with this act, should at least start the farmer back to normal conditions and to where farming will be profitable.

This act provides not only for refinancing mortgages now existing but also provides for new and better loans. We hope the day will soon come when it will not be necessary to mortgage the home at all. The happiest man in the world today is the man who is on a good farm that is free of debt.

Title 4 of this bill provides for relief to farmers living in agricultural improvement districts. This bill provides for refinancing them to the amount of $50,000,000. In my district, the Sixth District of Arkansas, this provision will be the saving of our very best agricultural lands.

The levy and drainage lands ought to be reduced to at least half of their face value before they are refinanced under this plan, and the landowners have the advantage of this reduction and are then given a period of 40 years to pay the other off.

When this is done, our farmers living in these districts will see the light of a new day. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, three members of the committee have thus far spoken on this bill. The chairman of the committee, the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], stated that in his mind we should have a bill with lower rates of interest, and he also stated that so far as he personally was concerned he believed in an expansion of the currency. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE], the ranking Republican member of the Agriculture Committee, said that in his mind this bill does not meet the problem; it does not have various provisions that he would like to see in the bill; and the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER] stated that he was not satisfied wholly with all of the provisions of the bill. I dare say that every man or woman who speaks in favor of this bill today must of necessity speak with some apology if he or she is honestly and seriously trying to do all that is possible for agriculture. [Applause.]

I am not going to make any apologies for this bill, because I say here now that so far as I am able in my humble, small way, I am going to resist the enactment of the bill, hoping that we shall be able to send the bill back to the committee, so that they may write a bill which will give some relief, some honest-to-goodness relief, to agriculture. [Applause.]

During the consideration of this bill before the committee I did all I possibly could to have the provisions of the so-called "Frazier bill" substituted for this bill and made the basis for our consideration in this refinancing legislation. I know there are a large number of Members of this House who believe in an expansion of the currency, such as is provided for in the Frazier bill. Many of you have been for a long time advocating a revaluation of the gold ounce, and others of you have been talking about monetizing silver. Some of you have expressed your preference for a bill that would pay public debts in Treasury notes or Federal Reserve notes. Others of you would provide for a general expansion of the currency with our present metallic base. Many Members of this House have different ideas as how the expansion of the currency should be brought about, and I think I can honestly say that a majority of the Members of the House at this time are in favor of some kind of an expansion of currency. I submit to you that this is the best possible means that you can find to expand the currency; at least, it is the only possible bill that you will have up for consideration in which you could provide for a free distribution of this expanded currency.

The Frazier bill, as you all know, provides for the refinancing of farm mortgages and farm indebtedness of all kinds with a rate of interest of 1½ percent per year, and amortization payments upon the principal of 1½ percent per annum. Oh, I know that many of you have been going along with the idea that the 6 percent rate and the 5 percent rate are something sacred, and you will raise your hands in horror at the thought of interest rates at 1½ percent per annum, but I say to you, friends of agriculture, that the farmers of this country cannot pay more than that rate of interest on the present value of their farms and their present mortgage indebtedness. If we were to refinance these farm mortgages with interest rates at 1½ percent per annum, it would give the farmers a breathing spell; it would enable them to pay off their farm debts, and it would restore to them their purchasing power, because they would have some money left after they paid their interest. It would restore their purchasing power and in that way, and only in that way, by restoring the purchasing power to the farmer, will we have any material increase in business or industrial activity.

As I said before, the bill provides for the issuance of new currency, Federal Reserve notes, in its final analysis, for the purpose of refinancing these farm loans. The bill has a provision that not in excess of $75 per capita of currency shall be in circulation at any time. That means that there is a limitation under the provisions of the bill to an expansion of about two and a half to three billions of dollars. There can be no greater expansion of the currency under the provisions of the bill. The bill also provides that farm-loan bonds shall be issued and offered for sale bearing 1½ percent interest. We all know that there would not be many of those bonds sold in the open market, so the bill provides that such bonds as are not readily sold shall be turned over to the Federal Reserve Board, and they in turn will turn over to the Farm Loan Commissioner an equivalent amount of Federal Reserve notes for the purpose of refinancing these loans.

It is estimated conservatively, I believe, that only about two or two and a half billion dollars of new currency, used as a revolving fund, will be needed to refinance all of the farm indebtedness of this country. That would provide for an amortization of the indebtedness, and the entire debt would be paid at the end of about 47 years. I believe that at the end of that period the present farm indebtedness of the country would be entirely wiped out, and there would be a substantial return to the Treasury of the United States of over $6,000,000,000, which it would receive in interest. I know the Government is not in the banking business, and it does not desire to make any profit out of loaning money particularly, but I believe it can loan this money to the farmers in such a way that the currency will be expanded and that as a result there will be some prosperity in the country. As I said a few moments ago, many Members of Congress have different ideas as to how the expansion shall take place. When we passed the bonus bill last year in this House, I believe it passed the House because a majority of the Members of the Congress felt that an expansion of the currency was necessary, and I am satisfied that when the House passed the Goldsborough bill by an overwhelming majority last year, the Members of the House felt it would result in an expansion of the currency.

I am satisfied that the Members of the House believe that when we considered the Glass-Steagall bill last year, it would cause an expansion of the currency, and that is the reason it passed the House. It provided for an expansion of the currency, but not in the interest of the people of the country, but in the interest of the banks. I find no fault with that. I am willing to help the banks as far as I am able. I recognize them as a necessary part of our economic system, but I submit that the Glass-Steagall bill, which provided for an expansion of currency, did not, as a matter of fact, increase the amount of circulating medium among the people.

Then, again, last year we considered the Glass amendment to the home loan bank bill, which provided for an additional $900,000,000 of possible expansion of currency, and, depending on the promises made on this floor that that would expand the currency, we passed that bill, but that did not help the people of the country. That again was a bill that helped only the bankers. I find no fault with that.

Then, again, the other day the question was, What should be done with the President's message on refinancing farm loans? The House broke a precedent, I understand. The Speaker referred the matter to the House as to the disposition of that message. Men who have sat on this floor much longer than I, have stated both on the floor and to me privately, that it has been the custom on all such bills to refer them to the Committee on Banking and Currency, but the House of Representatives, by an overwhelming vote the other day, being dissatisfied with the system that has prevailed in the last few years in this Congress on monetary matters, realizing that this was an opportunity to give some real relief and get away from this damnable policy of issuing new bonds, referred this message to the Committee on Agriculture. I was hopeful that the Committee on Agriculture would report out a bill which would meet with the approval of a majority of the Members of this House. As far as I am able, during the time we are considering this bill, I am going to exert every effort I possibly can to get a vote on the Frazier bill as a substitute for this bill. [Applause.] I recognize, having made the motion, which I will offer if I am able to be recognized—and I believe the rules will permit me to get recognition, unless some unforeseen circumstance arises and some person holding greater rank on the committee than I obtains recognition with some amendment that thus far has not been advanced—unless something happens along that line to take me off my feet, I shall make a motion to recommit this bill to the committee with instructions to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the Frazier bill, word for word, as it is now written. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. COX. My thought on the pending legislation is that the bondholder gets the lion's share of the benefit that is promised.

Mr. BOILEAU. And I agree with the gentleman completely.

Mr. COX. If, then, through the adoption of this legislation the American farmer is sold into a state of economic slavery to the mortgage holder, what hope of relief is there for him except not only through expansion of the currency but inflation, and drastic inflation at that?

Mr. BOILEAU. I agree with the gentleman entirely, and I submit that this bill as it is written today should have been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency—if we are going to leave it as it is written now—because it is a bankers' bill more than it is a farmers' bill, and it should be under their supervision.

I voted to refer it to the Committee on Agriculture, because I feel that a majority of the members of that committee—in fact, all of them—are anxious to do what they can do for the farmer, but we do not seem to be able to agree upon a plan that will give any relief.

I want to call attention to a few of the provisions of the so-called "farm relief bill". In the first place it provides for more bonds, and I believe it is about time we quit issuing bonds, at least until such time as we have used the resources of the Government sufficiently to expand the currency to the amount that is necessary to carry on the normal business of the country.

It provides for the issuance of 4-percent bonds, the interest to be guaranteed by the United States Government. When we start guaranteeing the interest on these bonds, we might as well admit we are back of the whole thing, because, after all, that is what it amounts to. These loans are made over long periods of time, and if they can have the guaranty of the United States Government that that 4 percent interest will be paid, the Government might just as well take over the responsibility of backing up the principal as well.

Secondly, this bill provides that loans shall be made to farmers at the rate of 4½ percent per annum. Oh, yes; it provides "not in excess of 4½ per cent", but I will tell you that the experts testified before our committee that you cannot sell bonds in these days unless you sell them at 4 percent. And he also said if you are going to pay 4 percent it is necessary to get 4½ percent interest. I leave it to you whether or not the farmer is going to get any lower rate of interest.

Now, the Federal land-bank law, of which this bill is merely an expansion, provides that when a farmer obtains a loan he must buy 5 percent of the amount of his loan in the stock of some national loan association or land bank. In other words, if he gets a $10,000 mortgage he gets $9,500 in cash and $500 in the stock of a national loan association, and they have not paid interest on those loan-association stocks for the last 3 years, and they will pay interest on those stocks in the near future. So the farmer pays 4½ percent on the $10,000 when he only gets $9,500; so that boosts the interest rate a little. Then all of these charges that are made in connection with the investigation, and so forth, are all placed upon the shoulders of the farmer.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the gentleman, from his experience, feel that these bonds can be sold for less than 4 percent interest?

Mr. BOILEAU. Not according to the testimony of the experts. They say you must have at least 4 percent. Bear this in mind also, that the very economic conditions that have brought about this terrible plight among the farmers is responsible for the high rate of interest on bonds, according to their statements.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another brief question?

Mr. BOILEAU. Certainly.

Mr. PARSONS. Is it not a fact that in recent flotations of Treasury issues they are taken at low interest rates? In fact, yesterday's paper indicated that an issue of Treasury notes was five times oversubscribed, and the rate of interest was only 1.75 percent?

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. The proposed Muscle Shoals bill provides only 3 percent interest and also requires that the bonds be sold at par.

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes. The provisions in regard to Muscle Shoals are a little better than the provisions for the farmers. I am in favor of a low rate of interest, but in my opinion there is no possible chance of the interest rate to the farmers being lower than 4½ percent. I think every Member of the House will agree with me in this statement.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The opinion has been advanced that this is the best bill that we can expect to be brought out during this session. Will the gentleman explain why this is so?

Mr. BOILEAU. I may say to the gentleman that if all the Members go along with the bill and pass it, it is the last chance we will have to do anything about it, and in that case will be the best bill we can get; but if we recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture with instructions to report out the Frazier bill we will have a much better bill. And I may say that if a motion to recommit with instructions to report out the Frazier bill fails I shall make a direct motion to recommit the bill to the committee with instructions to reconsider the bill, and then we will bring back a bill that really amounts to something.

This bill is merely a gesture. It is not a real effort to relieve agriculture. It provides that a farmer may not obtain a loan in excess of 50 percent of the value of his land plus 20 percent of the value of his permanent, insurable improvements thereon. I happen to live in a dairy district, and I am more conversant with conditions in the dairy districts than I am with conditions in other agricultural sections. Let me give you an illustration showing why I do not think this will be of any help to the dairy farmers, especially when they are getting 60 cents a hundred for milk that costs them $1.40 a hundred to produce.

Dairy farms are highly improved. A dairy farm must have a nice big barn with all modern equipment. A dairy farm has more permanent buildings and equipment for a small amount of land than any other type of farm. In my section of the country the value of the real estate and the improvements is divided almost evenly. Fifty percent of the value of the farm consists of land and 50 percent consists of improvements.

Now, if this be the situation, it means that dairy farmers can get only 35 percent of the value of their real estate in the form of a loan; and today, Mr. Chairman, these farms in many instances are mortgaged above the value of the real estate. How in the name of common sense can a farmer refinance his loan under such circumstances when he is only allowed a loan of 35 percent of the value of his farm? How can he refinance the indebtedness that exists on his farm under such circumstances?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Is it not also true that the boards of health of different cities in their inspection of milk-producing farms not only inspect the barns but test the cattle for tuberculosis, require that the milk-cooling vats be separate from the barns, and make other requirements to the extent that before the dairy farmer gets through with his investment the dairy farmer of necessity has a greater investment in equipment than any other type of farmer?

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman is entirely correct. This is the reason why the dairy farmers today are not going to get one iota of assistance under this bill.

What applies to the dairy farmer applies equally to that class of farmers who operate on a comparatively small acreage basis, because their permanent improvements in the form of barns and buildings are about equal to the value of the land. The man who has a 3,000-acre grain farm on the prairies has a little frame house and small outbuildings, which have no comparison in value to the improvements on the average dairy farm. He could get a loan of almost 50 percent of the value of his farm.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Wisconsin 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BOILEAU. Carrying out my thought with regard to these loans, it is argued on the part of the sponsors of this bill that although a farmer having a $10,000 mortgage on a farm worth $10,000 can only get $3,500 with which to refinance his loan, nevertheless this will bring about a voluntary scaling down of the mortgage on the part of the mortgagee. I submit for your consideration that the bill says the mortgage shall not be in excess of 50 percent of the value of the land and 20 percent of the value of the buildings. It speaks of value. This does not mean pre-war value; this does not mean 1920 value; this does not mean 1926 value. It means value at this time. Some say that those applying the provisions of the bill will give a liberal interpretation to this word "value." I hope they take this view of it and will interpret it liberally. But bear in mind that if this bill does result in the scaling down of any mortgages it will not be in the interest of anybody who is in bad condition at the present time.

If a farmer has a mortgage on his farm today equal to the full value of his farm, whether you consider it pre-war or present values, and there is only a small difference between pre-war values and values at the present time, because, according to the statistics of the Department of Agriculture, the present value of farm lands is about 80 percent of what it was in 1909–14 period.

Mrs. McCARTHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Let me carry through this thought and then I will gladly yield to the gentlewoman from Kansas.

I may say that the mortgagee may scale down the mortgage a little bit, but do you expect him to scale down his $10,000 mortgage below $10,000 when the farm is supposed to be worth that amount? He might scale it down 10 percent or 20 percent, but he is not going to scale down a $10,000 mortgage on a $10,000 farm to $3,500. It would be poor business, and I have not seen any banker in the country or any insurance companies that have been so generous to the farmers in the past, and I do not believe they are going to be so generous to them in the future. It is impossible to conceive of a holder of any mortgage scaling down that mortgage to less than half of the value of the farm, because he would be foolish to do so, and I do not think there is much chance of that happening.

I now gladly yield to the gentlewoman from Kansas.

Mrs. McCARTHY. Is it not true that 19 different agricultural States have memorialized Congress to pass the Frazier bill?

Mr. BOILEAU. That is true, and I understand that within the last 2 days 2 more have come in, so there are 21 State legislatures that have memorialized the Congress to pass this Frazier bill, and I ask those of you who are from farming sections to remember this.

I want to say to you something that to my mind is more significant. At the present time there is a delegation here of 250 farmers from the leading farming States, particularly from the West, demanding farm relief, and I happened to be at a meeting the other night at which these men were in attendance, and the chairman asked that all those who were in favor of having this administration bill rather than nothing to please stand, and there was not a living soul among them who stood up; but every single one of them arose when the question was put that all who were opposed to the administration bill and would rather have nothing than have it should stand up. Every single one of them arose in response to that inquiry.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman stated a moment ago that the hearings show that these bonds must bear at least 4 percent and stated he did not think they could be sold without that high rate of interest. The Frazier bill, as I understand it, provides for an interest rate of one and a half percent as interest and one and a half percent as payment on the principal.

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. How, then, could the Frazier bill be put into operation if the bonds cannot be sold at less than 4 percent?

Mr. BOILEAU. That is the best part of it all. There will not be any bonds sold. The Federal Reserve Board will take these bonds and they will issue currency on the basis of the bonds and put the Federal Reserve notes into circulation. There will be no interest, no tax-exempt bonds, no United States Government guaranty of interest on 4-percent bonds. This means an expansion of the currency and the putting of more money in circulation.

Mrs. McCARTHY. Is it not true we are now on a suspended gold basis? In other words, we are on a paper standard, and what better paper security for an issue of currency can there be than farm mortgages?

Mr. BOILEAU. I thank the gentlewoman from Kansas for her very valuable suggestion.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Wisconsin 3 minutes.

Mr. BOILEAU. A year ago when we talked about expansion of currency many Members of the House would rise up and say that if something like that should happen we would go off the gold standard and they would draw all the gold out of the United States. You have seen what happens when the United States Government decides it is not going to have the gold withdrawn from the country, and there is no danger of our going any farther off the gold standard than we are right now, and I insist we need not have any fear on that score.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. FOCHT. What will all this scaling down of bonds and all these complexities of refinancing amount to in the way of benefit to the farmer unless you provide a market for his product?

Mr. BOILEAU. I submit to the gentleman that at the present time the farmers in my district require about four times as much milk to pay off their debts as they did at the time they contracted these debts. If we cheapen the dollar and put more money in circulation, it will mean the farmer will get a higher price for his milk. It provides a basis for an increase of the commodity price level, and the other side of the scales is that when you cheapen the dollar you must necessarily increase commodity prices. This is the trouble in the country today. There is over $250,000,000,000 of debts in the country, and these debts for the most part were contracted at a time when the dollar was cheap, and we are now trying to pay those debts off with dear dollars, and this just cannot be done.

Mr. FOCHT. If I may go farther, did the gentleman notice that the Rural New Yorker, which is a leader in agricultural thought, has a current editorial advocating the thought which I have just expressed—that we must find a market and give our attention to selling farm produce instead of talking about financing debts which we can never pay.

Mr. BOILEAU. I do not know what the Rural New Yorker said, but I want to give you this caution: There are 3,000,000 farmers in the United States who are willing to lay down their implements on May 3 unless you pass some legislation of this kind. Do not forget that this national holiday movement is well organized. There are 182,000 farmers in Wisconsin, and 115,000 out of the 182,000 belong to the holiday movement and have pledged themselves to lay down their instruments and not produce anything and not bring anything to market on the 3d of May of this year unless relief of this kind is given. Farmers in other States are similarly organized. They are all opposed to the pending measure, so far as I have been able to learn, and I am sure that those who have not expressed themselves in opposition to this administration bill will certainly do so at the first opportunity.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. It it not a fact that if you double the amount of money in circulation, you increase the price of goods and reduce the debt; whereas, if you divide your currency in circulation you decrease the price of goods and increase your debt, and is not that what is wrong now; and do we not need the expansion of currency provided in the Frazier bill to reduce debts and increase commodity prices?

Mr. BOILEAU. I think the gentleman has eloquently stated the matter in a very few words. That is the whole situation in a nutshell.

I hope you will remember the plight of the farmer and that those of you who have advocated an expansion of currency in one form or another will unite and get back of a bill and pass a bill that will provide for the issuance of currency and then later on we will work out something that will take care of providing a metallic base. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HOIDALE].

Mr. HOIDALE. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I have not addressed the Members of the House before, and I did not expect to address the House now. This is a surprise to me. I come, however, from an agricultural State, the State of Minnesota. I voted here today for the rule that was proposed. I do not know that there is anything particularly wrong with that sort of a rule; it is the abuse of the rule that is wrong. As I have watched the proceedings of Congress in years gone by I have come to the conclusion that the Republicans enforced the rule for purposes of serving the Grundys of America, but we are invoking this rule for the purpose of serving the farmers and the common man. [Applause.] That is a proper use of the rule. When such a rule is invoked in an emergency for the purpose of serving the best interests of this country, then it is invoked for a proper purpose. But when it is invoked for the purpose of serving Grundys, it is invoked for an improper purpose.

The farmers have no patience to wait; they want action now, whether it is going to be by this bill or the Frazier bill, or some other bill. We want something done quickly, because men are losing their homes, not only on the farms but in the cities of the country.

Every hour of delay means more children out on the street without homes.

Mr. TERRELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOIDALE. Yes.

Mr. TERRELL. I should like to ask the getleman if he will vote for this bill in preference to the Frazier bill?

Mr. HOIDALE. I favor going along in the unbroken chain. I have started out to serve the administration in the hope that it would accomplish the breaking of this depression. The chain that has been worked out, I think, has been scientifically planned so that it will accomplish the desired purpose. I am willing to go along with the program and permit no break, such as would throw the whole plan into confusion. I am in hopes that the men who designed this structure, those who have made the plans, have so planned that we can go on and finish an edifice which, when completed, will be symmetrical on a foundation that may endure, for the benefit of all.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOIDALE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman mention the men who framed this program? Is the gentleman sure that he knows who framed the program?

Mr. HOIDALE. I am informed that the program has been made by the administration. If the gentleman from Oklahoma has any information as to who else did this planning, he should divulge it.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. I am asking the gentleman a question; who made it?

Mr. HOIDALE. I am assuming that the administration made it.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOIDALE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Does the gentleman know whether the administration is in favor of fixing on the American farmers a higher rate of interest than they receive on the European war debts?

Mr. HOIDALE. The administration intends to borrow the money as cheaply as it can be obtained. It is not bound to pay 4 percent or any other rate of interest. It will go into the market and get the money as cheaply as may be possible.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman vote to substitute the Frazier bill for this bill?

Mr. HOIDALE. I will decide that question when it is reached.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I want the gentleman to answer now.

Mr. HOIDALE. The gentleman from Minnesota is not in a position to dictate to this gentleman from Minnesota who is now addressing the House. I will decide that question after having heard all the arguments and after due consideration.

The purpose of this bill is to help the farmer, and I believe it will go far in that direction.

Years of neglect and unfair treatment have placed the farmer at the bottom of the pit. He needs and must have help to get out. I am here to help him to the full extent of my ability. It is only a question as to what is best to do. So many mistakes have been made in the past and so much abuse has been heaped upon agriculture that the country has in despair turned for leadership to a gallant champion of popular rights now in the White House. That leadership is established in the hearts of America's suffering multitudes. We believe in and we trust Roosevelt. To break the trust, to destroy the faith that our people have in that leadership, is to invite calamity.

With that confidence destroyed, where and to whom would we turn? Let us count the cost.

The administration is now engaged in forging, link by link, a chain long enough and strong enough to pull not only the farmer but all of us out of the ditch into which we have been dumped by those who have ruled in the past.

We are well on the way to that consummation. But if you weaken the chain, if you destroy the forward march of orderly and planned advance—and I say to you with all the earnestness I possess that if you now interrupt in any material way the program proposed you will have put in motion forces that destroy confidence—you will assassinate the trust and faith that now give us a sound basis for hope that a better day shall dawn. Are you willing to take the chance?

On this floor today has appeared evidence of a disposition to inject poison into the minds of the public. It may have been done unconsciously, but the effect is none the less real and destructive.

The gentleman from Oklahoma more than hinted that sinister influences are at work and in league with the President to harpoon the American people. This bill is placed upon this floor by trusted administration leaders in this body as an administration measure. The insinuation is now covertly made that the bill is in fact prepared by Wall Street, or some other selfish interest, for ulterior purposes. In the situation now existing in our distressed land this thrust into the side of a President, sorely beset by perplexing and perilous problems, calls for a rebuke from loyal and patriotic Members of this body.

And no less deserving of condemnation is the intimation made that the Members of the House are being held in line for the administration because the distribution of patronage is withheld. This is not only a false and unfounded reflection upon the Members, but nothing more unfair and untrue could be said about the President. Even the children of America understand that the President, and those who labor with him far into every night, has spent every waking hour in a determined effort to save us from a complete collapse. The administration has, in the interest of the common good, devoted its time to the orderly planning of legislative measures. In the meantime Republicans have continued to hold the offices. As grateful recompense for this self-sacrificing service, the Republicans are now charging that the President withholds patronage in order to employ delay as a weapon.

Fortunately for the President, he is not cast in the mold that employs methods such as attributed to him. In any event, let me remind the country that it is not necessary for the President to rely on patronage as a club. I realize that, to some extent, we must be partisans; but in this hour of agonizing trial and wide-spread distress let us at least be fair to the General who is leading the charge—a charge that we all should support until the hilltop is reached.

In closing, I want to say that there are Members of this House who have but a faint understanding of the farm problem and of the anguish and crushed hopes being suffered by our farm people.

Nothing cuts so deep and nothing hurts so much as the loss of a home that has been cherished as a haven of rest and a harbor of hope. Not only the farmer but the city dweller as well are having this cross thrust upon them.

To remedy the evil conditions that have put this blotch upon the fair face of our land, and to build in the place of these ruins of a grasping and greedy age, an enduring foundation of good will and good times is the purpose to which this administration and this Congress have dedicated themselves.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I guess everyone in this House is really interested in the farmer. Yet the fact remains that when the roll was called today on the rule, the postmaster drew first money and the farmers second money. When you Democrats sat here and voted for that rule today you were voting to keep yourselves in good patronage standing. That is what you were doing, and you know it.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Not now. So far as the Frazier bill is concerned, my good friend BOILEAU, of Wisconsin, has high hopes and aspirations that he is going to have a vote in this House on the Frazier bill. My good friend BOILEAU, forget that. The cards have already been stacked against you. That is the reason the rule was passed. That is the reason this bill was brought in here under a rule which would not permit amendments. That rule was brought in so there could not be a vote on the Frazier bill, and why? Too many of the Democrats who voted for that rule have written letters back to their constituents promising to vote for the Frazier bill, and they did not dare permit a situation in this House where there was a roll call on the Frazier bill; so, Mr. BOILEAU, you are not going to have an opportunity to get that roll call.

Mr. BOILEAU. I appreciate what the gentleman says, but the gentleman will recall that I said I should make every effort in my power to bring that about.

Mr. McGUGIN. Let us get to the bill now under consideration. Since when has it reached the point where in a piece of farm legislation this House of Representatives is willing to say to the country that it is wholly incompetent to pass a decision as between this bill and the Frazier bill or any other amendment, for that matter? I rather think that some day and sometime even the embattled farmers back home are going to be able to learn enough about the rules of this House so that they will know that the Members who sat here today and voted for this rule then and there voted against the Frazier bill.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Does the gentleman think the farmer back home cares a snap of his fingers about the rules of this House?

Mr. McGUGIN. It is going to be very important and necessary that the farmer learn to care, because it is when these rules are voted that the farmer is holding the sack. I rather think the farmer is going to find out. I understand that John Simpson, the head of the Farmers' Union, on his next national radio hook-up broadcast is going to say to the farmers of the United States, "Don't you pay any attention to those letters you are getting from your Congressmen as to whether or not they are in favor of the Frazier bill." I understand that he is going to ask them to write to him, and he is going to write back and tell them how every Member of Congress voted on the rule today, and if they voted "yes" on the rule, of course that is tantamount to a vote against the Frazier bill. I say that whether the Frazier bill is good or bad, this Congress ought to stand up and meet the issue.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I should like to interrogate the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. The gentleman has said that a man who voted for that rule voted against the Frazier bill. I voted for the rule and I am for the Frazier bill, and I am a Democrat. I voted for that rule because we have to have leadership, and we have to put through legislation—something the gentleman's party has not done in 12 years. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. McGUGIN. If the gentleman from Missouri is for the Frazier bill, then let it be understood that when he voted "yea" on the rule, he voted to make it utterly impossible for him or any other Member of this House to vote for the Frazier bill.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. JONES. If the Frazier bill or any other bill is in order, even if we did not have this rule, then it is in order on a motion to recommit, and this rule does not preclude a motion to recommit if the motion to recommit is germane.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the chairman of the committee now make a pledge to this House that when Mr. BOILEAU offers his motion to recommit and substitute the Frazier bill for this bill neither he nor any other member of the Agriculture Committee will make the point of order against it?

Mr. JONES. I do not wish to make any commitments for myself until the proposition is presented; and, of course, I have no authority to commit other Members.

Mr. McGUGIN. That is what I thought.

Mr. JONES. At the proper time I shall explain my position.

Mr. McGUGIN. I make this prediction, that when Mr. BOILEAU offers his amendment to recommit, to substitute the Frazier bill for this bill, someone high in the councils of the leadership of this House on the Democratic side will make the point of order, and that it will be sustained by a Democrat sitting in the Chair. Until the gentleman from Texas interrogated me, I really expected that he would be the gentleman who would make the point of order.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. I was interested in what the gentleman said about this man Simpson apparently becoming a dictator for all the farmers. Does the gentleman approve of any man undertaking to put himself in that position in this country?

Mr. McGUGIN. Oh, I cannot recognize a dictatorship.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman approve of his policy if he intends to carry that policy out? I have not a farmer in my district. A man who undertakes to follow that policy is a public menace.

Mr. McGUGIN. If he is, then it is a menace to government for the people back home to find out how we vote and the true import and meaning of our votes.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. RAGON. I did not understand the gentleman to say that he spoke authoritatively for Mr. SIMPSON. I think the gentleman's expression rather bore out the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK]. He sort of held it as a threat.

Mr. McGUGIN. No. I will say I do not know whether he is or not, but I think he would be entirely justified in doing it, because the people of this country have a right to know who voted for this rule and what is the consequence of their vote.

Mr. RAGON. Personally, I do not have any objection to the people's knowing how I voted on it at all, but I should like to know when the Frazier bill was first suggested.

Mr. McGUGIN. First suggested here?

Mr. RAGON. Yes; in Congress—in either body.

Mr. McGUGIN. The bill has been in existence for 2 years.

Mr. RAGON. I should like to ask the gentleman, before he inveighs against the Democratic side of the House, why his party did not bring out a rule on that bill 2 years ago when it first came here?

Mr. McGUGIN. My party has not been in control of this House during that time.

Mr. RAGON. They were 2 years ago.

Mr. McGUGIN. Well, I mean during the last two sessions.

Mr. RAGON. But the gentleman knows the Senate was in control of the Republicans until 2 months ago.

Mr. McGUGIN. The gentleman's party has been in control of this House since December 1, 1931.

Mr. RAGON. But the gentleman knows his party was in control of the Senate. Why did the bill not pass in the Senate? You also had a man in the White House.

Mr. McGUGIN. I am not responsible for the leadership in the Senate, and I do not know that the Republican Party has been in control of the Senate for a great many years either.

Mr. RAGON. Well, it has been Republican in profession, in any event.

Mr. BOILEAU. The Frazier bill was first introduced in the House of Representatives in the Seventy-second Congress.

Mr. McGUGIN. Now I want to discuss this bill, if I may.

The mortgages of this country are divided up so that the Federal land banks hold 12 percent of them and the joint-stock land banks hold 7 percent. If I can read and understand this bill—and if I cannot understand it that is not really a reflection upon me, because I am not so certain that a Philadelphia lawyer can understand it, and it will be interesting when the farmers over the country try to obtain relief under this bill—it gives some direct relief to the farmer whose land is mortgaged to the Federal land bank.

To that man, whose farm is mortgaged to the Federal land bank, if I read the bill correctly, this is the relief which he receives: His interest rate is cut to 4½ percent and he is in a position to obtain virtually a 5-year moratorium. Under the present circumstances that is an improvement and is substantial relief.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] has expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. That is substantial relief to the man who owes the Federal land bank. The man who owes the joint-stock land banks, if I read the bill correctly, will receive the following relief: He is assured that his interest will not be in excess of 5 percent, and he has a 2-year moratorium, provided the joint-stock land bank chooses to borrow any money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Now, if you go beyond that I cannot see wherein any farmer receives any measurable relief from this bill. I think this bill will give relief to 19 percent of the mortgagors of the country. The man who owes the insurance company or the individual or some other agency, if he receives any relief, he must receive it under the section which provides that the holders of mortgages can turn their mortgages in and receive in lieu thereof these 4 percent bonds of the Federal land banks; but the limitation is 50 percent of the value of the real estate, 20 percent of the value of the improvements. If you put that into actual operation, there will not be a single mortgage turned over to the Federal land banks by any holder of a mortgage, except where the farm is not worth the mortgage and the farmer has nothing to be protected.

The only exception there can be to that is if these open rebellions out in the farming country go on, and by force of arms they are unable to foreclose, perhaps then the holders of the mortgages will be glad to trade their mortgages for Federal land-bank bonds. The truth of the thing is, the very enactment of this bill will be the moving force for rebellions such as we have not yet seen in the farming sections against foreclosures, because that will be about the only way you will ever get a mortgage holder to turn in his good mortgage for bonds and only receive 50 percent of the value of the land for his mortgage. Otherwise he will retain his mortgage.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. What percentage of American farms today are worth the mortgages that are on them?

Mr. McGUGIN. Oh, that is a question, of course, that I cannot answer. I doubt if anyone this side of heaven can answer it. It may be the Lord can answer it. I cannot.

I am going to vote for this bill because I am not going to be in the position of saying that I will not give some relief to the 19 percent. Just because a bill has been brought in here which does not give substantial relief to 81 percent, and further because this bill is here under a rule which will not permit any amendment which will give relief to 81 percent, I am not going to stand here and vote against giving some relief to 19 percent.

The principal virtue I can see to this bill is that with the enactment of it, and with the failure that is sure to come, perhaps then with another failure we will at last come around to the point where the Congress will enact some legislation that will be uniform in its benefits, and benefit alike every property owner in the United States, whether farm or city, namely, reduce the value of the dollar that pays the debts. I choose to do it through the program advocated by the committee for the Nation which means a reduction in the gold content of the gold dollar. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a statement which I released to the press several days ago in relation to the arms embargo which is coming up for consideration next Thursday.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, the present administration apparently wishes war in Asia with Japan, as its proposed policy leads only in that direction.

It has sent to Congress a resolution demanding that the President be given the right to declare an embargo against the shipment of arms or munitions of war to any country in the world he may elect.

This resolution is at this time aimed particularly at Japan and indicates that the present administration has adopted the whole foreign policy of the last administration, which was completely dominated by the British Foreign Office and alien interests. This foreign office and these alien interests have constantly and persistently sought to have the United States abandon for all times its traditional and salutary policy of neutrality.

Impartiality is the keynote of neutrality. An arms embargo violates neutrality, and in international law the country against which the embargo is placed can regard it as an unfriendly and hostile act and as a cause of war.

If an embargo were placed against Japan, Japan would have the right in international law to take measures of reprisals, which might involve the seizure of American ships, the occupation of the Philippines, and ultimately even the engagement of the American Fleet if it came within any region which Japan desired to conquer or to protect; in fact, the making of war.

It has been disclosed (1) that the British Foreign Office has taken up the question of an arms embargo against Japan with the Department of State; (2) that the committee of the League of Nations which is proceeding against Japan has taken up the question of an arms embargo against Japan with the Department of State. This committee of the League is considering the enforcement of article 16 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, which is the war article of the League. Among other things, this article makes provision for determining "what effective military, naval, or air forces the members of the League shall severally contribute for the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the League."

It was particularly article 16 of the Covenant of the League, its war clause, together with article 10, which guarantees the territory of the League members, which kept the United States out of the League. For the United States now to take part in the enforcement of article 10 or article 16 would be national dementia.

There is even more than this to the proposal. It takes away from Congress the power to impose an embargo. It gives the President the power to decide which nation is an aggressor nation. It makes the President a judge of foreign disputes. This means that the President can declare war.

In effect, Congress abdicates its power to declare war, the greatest of its powers for the protection of the welfare of the American people. Parliamentary government becomes a mere form. We have in reality a dictator.

The American people will not tolerate a dictator or fatuous policies like those adopted before the last European war—policies said to be policies of peace whereas they lead inevitably to war.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes simply to make an explanation.

The gentleman from Kansas has been here long enough to know that his statement about the situation is wholly inaccurate. The adoption of this bill which will further a program which has been long delayed will not preclude the consideration of the Frazier bill or any other bill that is germane. If it might be offered as an amendment if we had no rule, it could certainly be offered on a motion to recommit.

The farmers are not as foolish as some people seem to think. Three members of the group to which the gentleman from Kansas referred and to which the gentleman from Wisconsin referred appeared before our committee. I talked to them after the hearings. They said they wanted the Frazier bill because they had been told it did certain things, but each one of them said, and said fairly, that he did not care whether it was the Frazier bill or some other bill as long as there was a proper expansion of the currency.

Order is Heaven's first law. What peculiar charm is there in having one wing of a program in a special bill? If this bill goes into effect and the other essential steps are taken, we will accomplish something for the country and accomplish it in an orderly way. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I may say in reply to the statement made by the distinguished gentleman from Texas that the Committee on Agriculture has no jurisdiction over matters or bills relating to the expansion of the currency or the issuance of currency, that the Committee on Agriculture ordinarily has no jurisdiction over bond issues, either. This bill, the administration bill, is one which provides for the issuance of farm-loan bonds. The Frazier bill contains a similar provision except it requires that these bonds shall be placed with the Federal Reserve System as security for the issuance of currency. I submit if this committee has jurisdiction over the issuance of bonds it is not a very bad stretching of the imagination to assume it might have jurisdiction of some other method of financing.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Certainly.

Mr. MILLARD. Was not a banking and currency bill sent to the Committee on Agriculture the other day?

Mr. BOILEAU. This is the bill to which the gentleman refers. Many Members of the House were of the opinion that properly it should have been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I voted to send it to the Committee on Agriculture because I believed the refinancing of farm loans was primarily an agricultural proposition.

Nothing was said in the President's message about additional revenue. The message in referring to the matter merely styled it the refinancing of farm-mortgage indebtedness. It did not say whether it should be done through the issuance of bonds or currency. The message was by this House sent to the Committee on Agriculture.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I voted yea on this rule and I shall vote for the Frazier bill or any similar measure the moment that it is introduced on the floor of this House. I resent the accusation that any farm leader or any Member of this House can go back to my constituency in Ohio and say that my yea vote on this rule is a nay vote on the Frazier bill.

What we need in this country today is action and not words. The farmers of this country want relief and they want this relief now from the money lenders and Shylocks of this twentieth century.

I say to you that every time the sun rises and sets, 3,000 farmers and home owners are having their homes taken away by the money lenders, the insurance companies, the private money lenders, and the joint-stock land banks. They are in mortal fear of that mortgage. The word "mortgage", taken from the two French words "mort", meaning death, and "gage", meaning hand, means the hand of death that is strangling and taking the lifeblood out of them day by day.

I tell you men of this House that back in Ohio our farmers are paying 5½ and 6 and 7 and 8 percent on their mortgage loans, and the enactment of this bill will be a godsend and a savior to these people.

For 12 long years there have been attempts to agree on farm relief bills in this House, and each successive attempt has been abortive and costly to the taxpayers. There is not a man among you who is more opposed to increasing the stranglehold that the banking interests of this country have upon this people. There is none of you more opposed to the issuance of more bonds to restore the power of this discredited group and to place them once again upon their thrones of ill-gotten wealth; but it is not a question of what you want individually, it is not a question of what I desire individually. The question is, What bill can we pass, what measure of relief can we give these people who each night go to sleep with the fear that the next day will be their last upon their old farmstead?

So the question is, On which side will you be, upon the side of these grasping, marauding money lenders who relentlessly demand their pound of flesh, or will you be upon the side of the people who made this great Nation of ours?

I say to you that as for my efforts I propose to be on the side of the tillers of the soil. I say that instead of affording relief to 19 percent, this bill will afford relief to 50 percent. There are three and a quarter million American farmers who are looking today to this House and to the Senate to save them from the strangle hold of these modern Shylocks. [Applause.]

Fundamentally I am opposed to the principle of this bill since all such bond issues only place more power and more wealth in the hands of the discredited bankers, and less in the hands of the Government, which means less in the hands and pockets of all the people who are the Government. However, this is a plan that has been approved and submitted by the President of the United States. He expects Congress to enact this bill into law. Congress should and will enact it into law because it is a part of the President's emergency legislative program, because it offers immediate hope to 3,000,000 farmers who are at the mercy of the money lenders, and because it will reduce farm-mortgage interest rates from an average of 6 percent to 4½ percent, and finally because it insures salvation and peace of mind for these worthy people who stand face to face with the grim specter of foreclosure, bankruptcy, and the poorhouse.

In my judgment it is high time that Congress correct the monstrous injustice done the Government, and hence its people, during all of these years in permitting the bankers of the country to usurp and annex the constitutional right vested in Congress, the Representatives of the people, to print, issue, and circulate the currency of the United States of America. Yet, despite the loathing that further exploitation by the bankers inspires, I expect to vote for this bill.

The people have demanded a new deal. They expected that new deal to apply a stricter supervision of banking and the flotation of securities. They demand a complete separation of commercial and investment banking; they demand that the power and authority to issue and circulate money be taken away from the bankers and restored to the Government where it belongs. The people are opposed to bonding the country into years of burdensome debt to restore to power and throne of slimy gold the discredited, repudiated, tottering money kings of Wall Street. The people thought they had clipped forever the claws and beaks of these vulgar buzzards of crooked finance. Notwithstanding the fact that I personally favor the refinancing of all farm mortgages at 3 percent interest by an expansion of the currency, I shall support this bill 100 percent, because the President believes in it, the people believe in him, and he has faith in our loyalty to him and the people to hold up his hands in any and all measures that he may present to this House.

Out of iron-shod despotism, out of slavery and servitude, justice, temporarily crushed to earth, inevitably rises again. One of the immedicable woes, one of the gaping wounds that led to political revolution last November, was the arrogance, the impudence, the greed, selfishness, and lust of a government of, by, and for the bankers. The revolution was fought and won. But the wound is unhealed. Today it is a festering sore, and if not cured soon will become a malignant cancer, whose creeping tentacles will not only destroy again their own institutions but the Goverment as well. Let us hope and pray that this courageous man in the White House, this Mayo in curing the ills of suffering humanity, will throttle once and for all time the evil, sinister influence of these captains of crooked finance, so aptly described on the floor of this House some time ago as "robbers of widows and orphans."

Even now these powerful banking groups, with the most insidious lobby of all—a lobby that has opposed farm relief, soldiers' bonus, veterans' disability allowance, mortgage moratoriums, and now the 6-hour day—brazenly attempt to dictate the terms of the President's bank deposit guaranty bill for their own selfishness and greed. I have here a letter from one of the big city bankers of Ohio, in which he says:

> The Glass bill, proposing to insure bank deposits, will prohibit the payment of interest on demand deposits. However, nothing is indicated as to establishing a maximum interest allowance on time and savings deposits. This appears to myself and other banker friends as being absolutely essential.
> The insurance of deposits, as you will readily see, removes any prestige of one bank over another in the solicitation of banking business, and due to this fact the Government should not allow in the proposed bill an opportunity for certain unethical bankers to solicit favorable business on a basis of payment of unsound interest rates on such funds which unethical procedure has in the past contributed in a large way.
> Assuming that such a bill passes and becomes law, it is our opinion further necessary that postal savings be disbanded.

Who are the ethical bankers? Who are the sound bankers? Who are the honest bankers? Who are the safe banks? What are sound interest rates?

Money cannot be loaned back into circulation, because of a lack of security under the present deflation. Nobody wants to borrow money to start in business with falling prices. The plutocratic city press oppose all inflation or expansion of the currency. If this policy is adopted, we can expect nothing else but confiscation, with its disastrous effects. Money should be fed into circulation by paying soldiers' claims in full legal tender—United States notes (prosperity notes)—and the same should be printed to balance the Budget and to refinance farm and home loans. Money should be loaned to farmers at not more than 3 per cent and the old robber mortgages destroyed.

Let us heed the warnings of our most illustrious statesmen:

> I believe that the banking institutions are more dangerous to our liberties than standing armies. Already they have raised up a money aristocracy that has set the Government at defiance. The issuing power should be taken from the banks and restored to the Government and the people to whom it belongs. Let the banks exist but let them bank on Treasury notes. (Thomas Jefferson.)
>
> If Congress has the right under the Constitution to issue paper money, it was given it to be used by itself, not delegated to individuals or corporations. (Andrew Jackson.)
>
> If a government contracted a debt with a certain amount of money in circulation and then contracted the money volume before the debt is paid, it is the most heinous crime that a government could commit against the people. (Abraham Lincoln.)

James Eckles, Controller of the Currency under Grover Cleveland, said:

> We bankers do not propose to let business have money to carry on until we first get our rake-off. (Taken from the Dearborn Independent, Feb. 9, 1924.)

As Germany loosed the fetters which had bound her for decades to Prussian terrorism and Kaiserism, as Russia cast off the shackles of a despotism worse than slavery, let the United States of America rise up in her wrath and fury and haul down the black flag of the Wall Street money kings and money lenders. Let this Congress heed these warnings and apply the remedy. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE].

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago we passed the farm allotment bill, intended to raise farm prices. This bill for relief on farm indebtedness is predicated on the assumption that the prices have been or will be greatly increased. Realization of that hope is too doubtful to be made a basis for a far-reaching law, rewriting millions of dollars in farm mortgages. The allotment bill was admittedly an experiment and a beginning. The supplementary legislation on farm financing was most eagerly awaited. Deep will be the disappointment in many a farm home when the terms of this proposed law are known.

The producers of the food of this country have been led to believe that they would be able to renew their mortgages at a much lower interest rate than that here provided. Interest has wrecked the farmer—usury, protected by legislative acts. It simply cannot be paid in such quantities. He must be put in a position to rent the use of money on terms which have some relation to other values. For more than a century the farmers of America have been the most patient producers of interest in the largest quantities ever known. Interest and the attempt to fix dividends for owners of public utilities have been among the major causes of the present debacle.

The farmer knows that he can give his note to a bank and the bank can take that note to the Federal Reserve and get Federal Reserve notes which will circulate as money. He cannot understand why he may not take his own note, backed by a mortgage on land, through his own organization, to that same Federal Reserve and get Federal Reserve notes which can be used to pay his debts and purchase the articles he needs. The Frazier bill, which makes such provision, meets with his approval.

In my own State of Oregon in many communities the banks have failed and the communities are issuing their own medium of exchange—printed on sheepskin, on wooden blocks, and paper—in an effort to substitute for a neglected function of government.

The farmers recognize that they are permanently outnumbered by the cities and that this trend toward centralization of population has placed them at a great disadvantage in legislative bodies. This bill well illustrates the tendency of such bodies to designate as "farm relief" a measure which is not acceptable to the farming population and is accepted only because the farmer is politically helpless.

The bill is in large part a bondholder's bill, of far more benefit to the mortgagee than the mortgagor. The rate of 4½ percent interest is unreasonably high. It cannot be paid unless there is a rapid advance in price of farm commodities. The prices of farm products are today about one third of what they were when the loans now to be renewed were made. It does seem, in all justice, that the money lender should assume part of the loss.

If the farmer could have had 2 percent for even 2 years it would have been a great encouragement to him. Just think what a benefit the fall in prices has been to the holder of mortgages if he can collect his interest and principal! Wallace's Farmer editorially, March 4, 1933, calls attention to the Grange finding that 4½ percent today is equal to 13½ percent on money loaned in 1925. There is no honest reason why all the enhanced value of the dollar should inure to the advantage of those who lend the money.

The Federal land banks and joint-stock land banks should have been compelled to pass on to the mortgagor part of the benefits that they will receive by reason of the enactment of the law. Lower interest rates should have been provided.

Land debts should have been scaled down. Decrees of foreclosures should have been legally allowed only when the mortgagees were willing to reduce the amount of judgments in proportion to the fall of commodity prices.

It is said this would nullify the sacredness of contracts. We farmers suggest equalization through taxation of the excess amount. Under the terms of this bill there may be some scaling down, but it is all voluntary upon the part of the mortgagee. Shylock can still exact his pound of flesh. There is no mercy to the borrower that the lender is compelled to extend. It is safe to say that on good loans on the best land there will be no scaling down of debts. When the security is doubtful and the risk is considered bad, then, of course, the banks may offer to scale down.

The debtor's situation in the matter of scaling down of debt is not improved by this bill.

Under section 301 loans on first and second mortgages may be made by the land banks up to $300,000,000. This is a very risky procedure and it is likely that most of the loans made under this section will be lost. A second mortgage is always a bad risk, especially at 75 percent of appraised value. The holder of the first mortgage should have been obliged to give the Government a first lien and to subordinate his lien to second place. By the provisions of the bill the Government virtually guarantees the first mortgage. Should the mortgagee not be able to pay the first mortgage, then the Government must protect the mortgagor or lose its lien. It will be to the interest of every holder of a doubtful mortgage to induce the mortgagor to secure a second loan from the Government, thereby making his loan that much more secure. [Applause.]

Mrs. McCARTHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PIERCE. I yield.

Mrs. McCARTHY. I believe the statement was made that the Frazier bill was not before the Committee on Agriculture. Is it not true that the bill (H.R. 2855) introduced by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE] was introduced on March 10 and referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and is not that bill identical with the Frazier bill?

Mr. PIERCE. I think it was not referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mrs. McCARTHY. I have the printed bill before me.

Mr. PIERCE. I think the gentleman wanted it to go to the Committee on Agriculture, but it went to the Banking and Currency Committee.

The bonds to be issued are virtually Government bonds. It is true that the interest only is guaranteed by the Government, but that is in perpetuity. It is a well-known fact that debts are seldom paid, they are just renewed. A bond carrying the Government guaranty of interest forever is, in effect, a Government obligation. All the bondholder wants is his interest and tax exemption.

The liquidation of the joint-stock land banks is, perhaps, necessary, but they are certainly receiving an immense advantage in this bill—a loan of $100,000,000 cash from the Federal Treasury at this time will enable these banks to take many dollars in profit that they should pass on to those who gave the original farm mortgages. A loan of 75 percent of appraised value is really a sale of the property. In most cases the appraised value of a farm is at least 25 percent higher than cash value. Farms have today practically no cash value, and they will not have any until the prices of farm products advance materially.

This bill provides for 2,000 million dollars. It would give $2,000 each to 1,000,000 farmers. The money would go far to restore agriculture, if it were used in a different way.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman explain what effect this bill is going to have on the holders of stock in the joint-stock land banks?

Mr. PIERCE. I do not think there is any question about it—they are liable to assessments of 100 percent on the stock. They got a hundred million out of the Treasury, and this will undoubtedly enable them to buy up a large quantity of bonds selling at a discount.

Mr. McFARLANE. And the stock is only worth 30 or 40 percent.

Mr. PIERCE. The stock is not worth anything, but the bonds are worth about 30 cents on the dollar, although some of the banks are in the hands of receivers.

Mr. PATMAN. Does the gentleman mean that they will be enabled to purchase bonds at 30 cents on the dollar and hold them for 100 cents on the dollar?

Mr. PIERCE. I know banks that hold options on them.

Mr. PATMAN. They will get the Government money and not give the farmers the benefit of it.

Mr. PIERCE. I do not think there is any doubt about it.

Most of the farmers have lost their life's savings raising and selling hogs, cattle, sheep, cotton, corn, and wheat at less than the cost of production. Should the holders of securities take over the farms and villages under their liens, they will find they will have little value as taxes and upkeep will absorb rent value. It is ridiculous to think prosperity can be brought back by giving farmers 4½ percent interest.

The farmer has ruined himself, his banker, his merchant, and his community trying to pay an average of 5½ percent. Can anyone believe that a reduction of 1 percent annually is going to save him? It will take more than this to keep the American farmer from tenantry and peasantry.

We are living in the age of repudiation brought on by no act of those who are obliged to do the repudiating. Our present economic despair is the result of man-made laws that have granted most of the bountiful things of this marvelous civilization to the favored few.

Notwithstanding all the faults of this bill, I shall vote for it. It provides a very thin slice of bread when the farmer expected a whole loaf. It does provide a breathing spell. The hand of foreclosure will be stayed.

When this bill becomes a law many a farmer will have time to collect his scattered resources. In the meantime he will have a roof for himself and his dependents. He can raise much of his own food. For a short time he can keep out of the bread line. It is the best and probably the only law that can be passed at this time.

In the rapidly moving events of this wonderful century, 2 years is quite an extension of time. The farmer must take what amounts to a pauper's oath to secure that extension. Other lending agencies will be affected by this legislation and become more lenient. In fact, in the Pacific Northwest it is freely stated that the insurance companies are more lenient with the borrowers than are the Federal land banks.

All legislation is largely a matter of compromise, and this seems to be the best now obtainable. It must be followed by far more sweeping and effective laws giving to the farmer lower interest rates and lower freight rates. There must be a far more equitable division of the rewards of human effort. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I suppose I ought to make the same confession that everybody here can honestly make after hearing the lengthy discussion on this matter, pro and con. I presume we are all going to be in the same position of the judge down in Missouri who, while officially sitting on the bench, was imbibing a little from a bottle of Missouri corn. Along about 4 o'clock in the afternoon he came out of the courthouse and started to throw the saddle onto his horse. He threw the saddle on backwards. There was a young attorney standing there, and he said, "Judge, I think you have that saddle on backwards." The judge looked at him and said, "Young man, how in the devil do you know in what direction I am going?" [Laughter] After we hear 8 hours of discussion on this bill we shall be in the same position as the judge—not know in which direction we are going.

Now, I want to make a confession. I am not a dirt farmer. I was raised on a paved street, and my diet was orange juice and calories. I do not want to represent myself to the members of this Committee that I am a practical dirt farmer. I am not going to be like the gentleman down in Kansas who was a candidate for Congress.

He told his constituents that he was a farmer, that he knew all about it, that he could do everything that was done on a farm, and all that sort of thing. While he was in the midst of his peroration a little boy got up and said, "Mister, did you ever lay an egg?" Now, when you represent yourself as a dirt farmer it might develop some embarrassment.

But whether I am a dirt farmer or not, and whether the Members of this House are dirt farmers or not, we can all appreciate the plain, uncontrovertible arithmetic of the following illustration: If I have 160 acres of land in Illinois and set aside 40 acres for pasture and then seed 80 acres in corn that raises 60 bushels to the acre at 16 cents a bushel, and 20 acres in oats that raises 60 bushels to the acre at 9 cents per bushel——

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Not now.

Mr. DOBBINS. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that since Mr. Roosevelt became President the price of corn has doubled.

Mr. GILCHRIST. But does the gentleman know that corn dropped 3½ cents last Friday?

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is true that the price of corn has raised some, but not sufficiently to destroy the illustration that I have in mind. If out of the 160 acres I also plant 20 acres in wheat at 35 or 40 cents per bushel, you will find that the income from the 160-acre farm that at one time was worth $250 an acre is but $1,200. Now strike off $1.50 or more per acre for taxation and $250 for seed, and then strike off for the mortgage that may exist on that farm; you will find that many Illinois farmers do not have the wherewithal to live, they have not sufficient money with which to pay the interest or retire any installment on the principal of that mortgage. That in a sense represents the condition that we are in out in Illinois at the present time. Someone asks how acute the problem is. I shall tell you. The Federal land banks on the 31st of December 1932 had 19,618 farms that they could say were theirs. The joint-stock land banks had 6,406 farms to which they had title. Then the 20 leading life-insurance companies of America had title to 22,000 farms. There is a total of 48,024 farms which became the property of the mortgagees, and that indicates in a sense how acute the condition is at the present time. Then, the incidental problem which goes with it is this.

It is represented in the millions of dollars of bonds that have been sold to people, who thought that a farm-mortgage bond was a gilt-edge security, something that really was worth while. These people are now suffering and in distress, because they cannot collect either the principal or the interest which is due them on these bonds. The farm distress, therefore, not only affects the country, but it affects the people in the municipalities all over America, as well. What is the reason for this distress? Precisely what I pointed out a moment ago—ruinous prices for agricultural commodities. What relief can be afforded? Either raise prices or lower the fixed charges against the farmer as is proposed in this bill. There are, however, some items in this bill that require mending. One in particular relates to joint-stock land banks, which, by the terms of this bill, are to be liquidated.

I want to fall in line with what the gentlemen here had to say about the joint-stock land banks. The fact is that on the 31st of December 1932 the joint-stock land banks had outstanding, in round numbers, $459,000,000 in mortgages and $427,000,000 in bonds. The net worth of the mortgages owned by the joint-stock land banks over the bonds issued by the joint-stock land banks was approximately $31,000,000. Under the terms of this bill, what is to prevent them from going to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, taking a portion of the $100,000,000 that will be made available to them, and purchasing some of the bonds outstanding, so that ultimately they will have a mortgage set-up or a capital-structure set-up, without any outstanding indebtedness in the form of bonds?

The question was raised here as to what the quotations on the bonds are. Here is a quotation that comes from La Salle Street in Chicago, dated the 15th of March 1933. In Chicago those bonds are selling for 16, and in the defunct land bank in Minnesota they are selling for 7. The price range for all of these bonds issued by the 46 different banks runs from 7 to 60, and in most cases it is around 25 and 30. So that with the $100,000,000 made available under this bill to the joint-stock land banks it will invite and encourage speculation and make it possible for these banks to buy back their bonds and keep their mortgage structure intact, and thereby enrich the holders of the stock. Under such conditions, where does the poor farmer get off? He gets no particular benefit, provided his mortgage is being held by one of these banks.

While I should like to see some amendments incorporated in this bill, I am not insensible to the need for immediate action in behalf of the millions of distressed farmers of the Nation, and I therefore believe that I can follow the rest of the gentlemen who have talked here this afternoon and say that I am going to vote for this bill in the hope that it will do some good. I am afraid, however, that the section which relates to the orderly liquidation of joint-stock land banks will probably encourage speculation so far as joint-stock land bank bonds are concerned, and in that proportion diminish the benefit that might ultimately accrue to the American farmer. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY].

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, the district I represent in Congress has not a single farm in it and I do not know of a farmer who resides there. However, I am going to support this legislation, because I realize the sad predicament of the farmer. But I wish to call attention to a like situation confronting the home owner in our urban districts and the concommitant situation of the municipality in which he resides. This farm-mortgage assistance is but one chapter in the whole comprehensive plan, and it is but one step in the rehabilitation of home owners, urban and rural. Throughout these days of emergency legislation we have all had constantly before us the critical situation of the small-home owner and have been awaiting the day when we could have legislation designed to deal, swiftly and directly, with his immediate problems.

I am sure that we are all happily and agreeably gratified by the press notices of April 9 which assure us that our great President, struggling with the almost insoluble problems thrust upon him as a resultant outgrowth of this depression, in his wisdom and far-reaching vision, has brought forth a plan for the relief of the urban-home owner.

Briefly, this plan, according to press notices, is as follows: it is similar to the farm-mortgage relief plan. A corporation would be established to handle home mortgages with funds supplied by a $2,000,000,000 bond issue. This corporation will entertain applications for relief from small-home owners unable to meet their payments, either in principal or interest, and where the holders of mortgages are threatening foreclosure. The corporation will propose to the holder of the mortgage that it take over the mortgage from him at a proportional figure—which figure is yet to be determined. In exchange for his mortgage, the mortgage holder will receive a bond of the corporation in the amount of the revised mortgage, bearing interest at 4 percent, which interest will be guaranteed by the Government. It is believed that mortgage holders generally will be happy to liquidate their dubious mortgages at a considerable sacrifice rather than face the possibility of having the property thrown back on their hands. The reductions in principal effected will be passed on to the home owner and he will be given a moratorium of 3 years in which he will not be asked to reduce the principal but, of course, he must meet the interest payments. The amount of interest to be charged the mortgagee by the corporation has not as yet been settled, but it is predicted that it will be higher than the 4 percent paid by the corporation. This legislation, now in the process of formation, would differ from the farm plan in that it would cover only existing debts and would not be used for new finances. It is the President's aim, of course, to have the lowest possible rate of interest charged.

Such legislation will extend to the home owner sorely needed relief, and it is my hope that it will be enacted into law as swiftly as possible. But, in my opinion, it deals with but one part of the problem. There still remains the delinquent-tax situation, which is imminent and which affects both the taxpayer and the structure of his local government.

Over 1,000 municipalities throughout the country (leaving only 7 States unaffected) are in default on municipal bonds. Two thousand more municipalities are facing default within the next year. In a circular received from the mayor of Coral Gables, Fla., the situation is epitomized in the following words:

Municipal default immediately starts a vicious circle of further and progressive impairment in market values (and, necessarily, in values for the purposes of taxation) of real estate in the defaulting community; stagnation and extinction of equities through continuing depreciation; a renewal of the flood of foreclosures; distressed owners, apprehensive of confiscatory taxation, "dumping" their holdings; concentration of ownership of real estate in the hands of mortgagees, and further competitive price-cutting, driving down the price level, and the elimination of the small-home owner. The result would be steadily decreasing property values, progressive attrition of the means of property owners; tremendous impairment in tax collectibility and in the security of the bondholder.

Many of our cities today have tax deficiencies as high as 40 and 50 percent and predictions are made that, by next year, unless a remedy is provided, the astounding proportions of from 60 to 80 percent may be reached. Taxes have increased to unthought-of figures and the strange anomaly has been presented of assessments generally increasing while real-estate values have been in decline (in many cases they have fallen to one half their values in 1928 or 1929). In my State of Massachusetts, in the last 10 years, taxes paid locally on real estate and tangible personal property have increased from 122 million to 205 million dollars. The cost of public welfare in Massachusetts has gone from $5,000,000 in 1930 to $30,000,000 in 1932.

Real-estate holdings are the true mainstay and backbone of municipal revenue. Today, in Massachusetts, real estate and other tangible personal property is paying about two thirds of all the taxes, although, in total, it makes up only one sixth of all the wealth in that State. In short, on the one hand, the income of the home owner has been tremendously reduced by declining wages and unemployment, and the value of his property has decreased; and, on the other hand, his assessments have not decreased, his tax rate has greatly increased, and the burden of taxation borne by him has increased by over 67 percent in the past decade. Such a condition can have no other effect than to work speedy and certain disaster on this class of people and, correlatively, upon the municipalities in which they reside, unless measures of relief are rapidly adopted.

The fate of the small-home owner is integrally related with the existence of the community. Present conditions have made inevitable a tremendous number of defaults in the payment of taxes. According to the figures of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, real-estate foreclosures during 1932 were 274.9 percent higher than in 1926. And this figure bids fair to be even larger this year. As other sources of city income dry up, more and more of the burden of taxation is shifted onto the shoulders of the home owner. The condition of the city treasury is quickly affected when the income of the home owner is diminished. These home owners represent the blood stream of the community. Permit an embolism to occur in this blood stream and the very existence of the community is jeopardized.

In 1895 Nathan Matthews, then mayor of Boston, delivered a valedictory address in which he prophetically stated that the object of a municipality—is not to make a pecuniary profit for its members, but to provide for their safety, health, and comfort, their education and pleasure, to relieve their poor and help their sick, and generally to do things that no business corporation was ever chartered to accomplish.

In this time of great distress and adversity it is absolutely essential that these communities go on performing their functions lest the hundreds of thousands who are now in need and want should be abandoned into a condition of utter desperation. Yet the burden of such service has been increased to such a staggering total that the existence of the community undertaking it is menaced unless the firm, helping hand of the Federal Government is extended to assist it.

This Nation owes its greatness to that sturdy class of small-home owners who have battled courageously and self-sacrificingly in order that the coming generation might grow up in surroundings and environment most conducive to the normal and healthy development of mind and body, an environment which would inculcate qualities of character and civic pride. The home represents the highest development of our family life. Here is preserved the family unit so necessary to our national existence. In any community the home owner is the valued citizen. He has built his castle there and is most interested, for the sake of those dearest to him, that orderly government obtain. He pays the bill to maintain the services of government in that community.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY] has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HEALEY. In many instances his ownership of an equity in a home represents years of struggle and sacrifice, thrift and economy, industry and self-denial, to the end that a home may be owned in which those dear to him may dwell in the circle of the family to be nurtured in ideals which will make them worthy to become our Nation's citizens. Here are deposited the savings of a lifetime and here reside his fondest hopes and most cherished ideals. Our Nation owes him much. He should not be forgotten in this hour of adversity.

In order to meet the delinquent-tax phase of the situation a bill has been introduced by my distinguished and able colleague and esteemed friend, Mr. MCCORMACK, of Massachusetts. This bill has a kindred purpose of aiding the small-home owner. It, moreover, provides a method whereby States, counties, and local political units may receive revenue from taxation which is now incapable of collection except by tax sale. This bill, H.R. 4358, proposes that the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, or such other agency as the President may direct, be authorized to make loans to any home owner of not more than one family dwelling, if such dwelling is designed for the use of not more than three families, for the purpose of enabling him to pay taxes, including penalties, on such dwelling which are unpaid at the time of its enactment and to pay such taxes for a period of 2 years after the enactment of the bill. It further provides that the President be authorized, if he finds that continuing economic conditions require it, to extend the provisions of the bill for another year. Under section 3 thereof the bill proposes that loans shall be made only to those home owners who have made a diligent effort to meet such tax payments, but whose inability to meet the said tax payments is due to unemployment or other consequences of the depression. It provides that the loans shall be made for a term of not more than 2 years and shall bear interest of not exceeding 4 percent per annum. The loans shall not be paid directly to the borrower, but rather to the collector of taxes, or official charged with the duty, under the law, of receiving taxes. To provide funds for the carrying out of this legislation, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall allocate and make available to the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, or that agency which the President may direct, the sum of $500,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized, under its terms, to raise this sum by the issue of bonds, notes, debentures, or other obligations.

Thus, we have two very meritorious propositions designed to relieve the present distress of the home owner. They are correlated and supplementary. The President's plan purposes to relieve the tension insofar as the payment of the principal and interest on the mortgages is concerned. The McCormack bill makes provisions for the tax-deficiency aspects of the situation. The problems of the municipality and those of the home owner are inseparably connected. Let us then face the situation in its entirety and pass such legislation as will render relief to both. For this reason I would urge that the McCormack bill be considered simultaneously with the President's proposal and its features be incorporated into legislation following the President's proposal—to the end that family life may be preserved in our Nation and our municipalities strengthened by the revenue which will flow from the collection of delinquent taxes. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ARNOLD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 4795, the farm mortgage refinancing bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—FARM MORTGAGE REFINANCING BILL

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have 5 legislative days within which to extend their remarks on the pending bill.

Mr. GILCHRIST. And on the rule, also?

Mr. JONES. And on the rule.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas mean 5 days from the passage of the bill?

Mr. JONES. Five days after the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOIDALE. Mr. Speaker, considering that the whole farm-relief program will probably go to conference to be finally whipped into shape, I call attention to suggestions made by E. G. Quamme, of Minnesota, formerly president of the Federal land bank at St. Paul. The plan has found much support in the West, and I will set out briefly an outline of the proposal.

Loans would be made by the Federal land bank upon a fair appraisal of the real value ascertained by agreement between bank appraisers and local experts, such as county agents.

Against and upon these mortgages the bank would issue bonds.

These bonds would be pledged by the Federal loan bank with the Federal Reserve bank and used by the reserve bank as a foundation for a currency issue. The reserve bank would hold the bonds and pay for them by turning over to the Federal loan bank such new currency, dollar for dollar.

This currency would be used by the Federal Reserve bank to hand over to the farmers in exchange for the mortgages accepted.

It is suggested that the interest rate be made as low as 2 percent, one half of 1 percent to cover costs of operation and to establish an insurance fund against possible losses, one half of 1 percent to go to the Government as a source of revenue, and the remaining 1 percent to be placed into an amortization fund, which would provide for the automatic retirement of the currency.

This plan would afford a way of expanding the currency without the danger of continuing inflation. It would, in fact, provide for gradual cancelation of the new currency to the extent that farmers would be reducing their mortgage obligations by reducing the loan principal; that is to say, the currency would be reduced to the extent of the amortization principal paid.

The thought behind the plan is that it would serve a double purpose: Give the farmer a chance to get away from an interest loan that is crushing, and it would also, because of the currency expansion, raise prices on its products. The improved financial condition on the farms which would result would tremendously increase purchasing power and business activity.

This is a brief and rough outline which may well be considered and compared with the many other remedies now advanced for relief of interest burdens and as a medium for advancing prices on all products to a higher level. It is claimed that, with proper provisions to guard against abuses and dangerous extremes, this form of security as a basis for currency would be entirely sound and feasible, and there is now an increasing number of people who share this view.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the passage of this measure will mark another step in the administration program to revive agriculture, restore confidence, and bring back prosperity to the American people. This bill is not entirely satisfactory to the farming interests, who are disappointed in some of its provisions, but it is decidedly a step in the right direction and will do much good. It is far superior, in my opinion, to all the legislation of a similar nature enacted during the past 12 years. Indeed, it will extend financial aid in a beneficial manner and to an extent which has not heretofore been even attempted. I shall, therefore, be happy to give it my affirmative vote.

However, I should have much preferred to have this important bill considered under the 5-minute rule, with an opportunity to offer amendments. I voted against the resolution to consider it under suspension of the rules, with no privilege to amend. I have the highest regard for the able chairman and members of the Agricultural Committee, who reported the bill in its present form, but I am a strong believer in the fullest and freest consideration of all measures that come before this representative forum of the people. I am well aware of the fact that the Republicans in the past have, as a majority party, brought in their administration measures in the same parliamentary fashion as is being done by the Democratic majority now, so I have not been nor will the country be much impressed by their outbursts against a method of procedure which they have invariably followed when in power. What I contend for is that the Democratic Party, as the great, progressive, and liberal party of the Nation, should now pursue a truly Democratic course, regardless of the modus operandi of a reactionary political organization which has been repudiated by the electorate.

Ladies and gentlemen of the House, if this bill were subject to amendment, a lower interest rate would undoubtedly be proposed. I am fearful, judging from the expressions of the farmers in my part of the country, that they will be unable to pay 4½ percent plus amortization fees.

Furthermore, I believe that a proviso should have been incorporated to the effect that as part of the consideration passing for the benefits, privileges, and emoluments enjoyed by the Federal land banks and joint-stock land banks said banks be required to grant credit by way of offset and counterclaim for their bonds surrendered by the farmers on their mortgage indebtedness. This would have enabled the farmers to derive the benefit from the low market price of these bonds and thereby reduce their mortgage debts correspondingly, for the bonds are to be liquidated at par. I believe that such a stipulation predicated on the element of consideration would have been sustained and upheld by the court. However, the substantial relief and benefits which will accrue to the farmers by the refinancing, moratorium, and other meritorious features of this law will more than outweigh these omissions and its less desirable sections, which can be corrected in subsequent legislative acts of the Congress.

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, we are fiddling while Rome is burning, blind to danger signals, drunk with power which is always blind to reality. So far we have passed no real legislation to relieve the depression. The so-called "relief measures" that have been passed are make-believe and not real. They have not checked unemployment—there are more unemployed today than there were on March 4. The farm relief bill and the refinancing of agricultural indebtedness bill—bills passed by the House—are simply muddying the water. The only relief in these bills is in the title. The substance is a stone in place of bread.

If, when this Congress opened, we had had the courage to pass the Frazier bill, the cost of production for that part of the farm products used within the United States, the Patman bill to pay the soldiers in cash, and the Wheeler bill to remonetize silver, and then adjourned and gone home, this Nation would have experienced the greatest period of prosperity it ever witnessed. In place, we have been fiddling while Rome is burning. We are concerned with make-believe legislation but not with realities, and unless we get down to business and heed the danger signals all along the line, we will have a rude awakening. One hundred and twenty-five million people will not forever submit to the stupidity of a drifting and floundering government, when millions are starving in the midst of plenty.

I here quote from resolutions adopted by farm organizations which show that there is intelligent and constructive thinking going on throughout this Nation.

I quote from a resolution adopted by Dunn County Farmers' Union, Dunn Center, N.Dak., March 16, 1933:

* * * Whereas agriculture, the basic industry of the United States, has long been struggling to keep up an existence and getting nothing in the form of relief except political promises, until now this industry has reached a stage where farmers cannot go farther without the complete loss and sacrifice of their homes; * * *: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Dunn County Farmers' Union, assembled in regular meeting at Dunn Center, N.Dak., on March 15, 1933, That we demand that our United States Congress, now in special session, immediately consider and enact far-relief legislation that will guarantee the farmer cost of production for that part of his products consumed in the United States.

Further, That farm indebtedness be refinanced such as provided for in the Frazier bill. * * *

I quote from another resolution adopted by an assembly of citizens of Redfield, S.Dak.:

Whereas the authors of the Bill of Rights, the Articles of Confederation, the Declaration of Independence, and the Constitution of the United States of America have provided for changes in the operation of laws and customs to conform to changing conditions and the requisite of the common welfare arising from such changed conditions; and

Whereas President Herbert Hoover and our President, Franklin D. Roosevelt have declared unequivocally that expansion of the currency circulating is primarily essential for the return of prosperity. President Hoover urged the enactment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation on the ground that it would give the country "a potential currency inflation of $20,000,000,000", and that "the country has need of it for a revival of prosperity"; and

Whereas the United States Government has admitted a debt due the World War Veterans and evidenced same by granting them certificates payable in 1945 and * * *

Quoting again from a resolution adopted by Eureka Local No. 670 of the Farmers Union of Ward County, N.Dak.:

We, the 105 members of Eureka Local No. 670, of the Farmers Union of Ward County, N.Dak., assembled in special meeting, this 23d day of March 1933, do resolve that we are squarely behind the Frazier refinancing bill, as it was originally drawn, and we demand that the same be passed at this special session of Congress.

Quoting from another resolution adopted by Ward County Farmers Union convention:

We, the Ward County Farmers Union, in quarterly convention at Minot, N.Dak., this 22d day of March 1933, representing 2,000 farmers, do resolve that we are squarely behind the Frazier refinancing bill as it was originally drawn and demand that it be passed at this special session of Congress without delay.

And from another resolution adopted by Ellendale Farmers Union, of Ellendale, N.Dak., I quote:

Whereas the United States Government has made such liberal loans to the bankers, railroads, and insurance companies at a very low rate of interest to tide them over the present period of depression, and

Whereas agriculture has been repeatedly deflated every year since the end of the great World War, with the result that the agricultural industry is on the verge of utter bankruptcy; and

Whereas the prices for agricultural products have been depressed to such an extent that it will take at least three times the amount of agricultural products to pay a loan made a few years ago. In other words, it is equivalent to trebling the principal, interest, and taxes, and—

I also quote from a resolution adopted by Watford City Local, of the Farmers Education and Cooperative Union of America, at Watford City, N.Dak., April 1, 1933:

Whereas we believe that the present economic condition has become so grave that immediate action is necessary if our Government is to continue to exist and its people given a fair chance to recover from this unprecedented depression. Millions of our people have lost the savings of a lifetime and have been thrown on the mercy of society for support; all avenues of relief are becoming exhausted, and unless speedy action is brought about guaranteeing cost of production to the farmers, and employment at reasonable wages for the millions of unemployed the inevitable result cannot be in question. Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Watford City Local of the Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union of America in its regular meeting held at Watford City, N.Dak., April 1, 1933, That we most emphatically urge upon Congress and the President that the following bills be passed.

I quote from another resolution adopted by North Dakota Holiday Association of Sargent County, Forman, N.Dak., on March 25, 1933:

The North Dakota Holiday Association of Sargent County held a mass meeting in the courthouse at Forman, Saturday, March 25. The object of this meeting was to discuss the mortgage situation and elect a council of defense to prevent mortgage foreclosures, both real estate and chattel.

* * * * * * *

Resolved, That we are in favor of the immediate passage of the Frazier farm relief bill, or legislation along exactly similar lines, and are opposed to any patching up of the present farm-mortgage system, or any system that provides for higher interest rates on farm mortgages than the rates paid to the Government by the Federal Reserve System.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

I quote from another resolution adopted by North Dakota Holiday Association meeting at the courthouse in Crosby, N.Dak., April 8, 1933:

We urge Congress to immediately pass legislation for the refinancing of the farm indebtedness under the provisions of the Frazier bill, or similar legislation. In any event, the interest rate and amortized payments should not exceed 3-percent interest. The business of financing should come directly from the Government without the intervention of banking racketeers to add more to the farmers' interest rate.

I quote finally from a resolution adopted in Bottineau County at a holiday association meeting from eight counties where there were 4,500 farmers present, held April 10, 1933:

SECTION 1. We demand that the Federal Land Bank of St. Paul permit farmers now living on foreclosed land, or that may hereafter be foreclosed, to retain possession of the premises, whether foreclosed or not, and that those farmers be refinanced to repurchase said land. Any other course is certain to cause serious trouble and loss of life. These farmers have no place to go and cannot be removed without wide-spread disorder.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 5. We insist upon the cost of production being in any price-adjustment plan enacted by Congress.

SEC. 6. We insist that any plan of the Federal Government to finance the farmer be handled by the issuance of currency and not by a bond issue; and that the rate of interest to farmers shall not exceed 1½-percent interest and 1½-percent amortization.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, in taking the floor today, I rise for the first time during this extraordinary session of Congress, a Congress that was called almost immediately to consider what we in the Middle West understood to be that of passing adequate and protective farm-relief legislation.

The administration bill that is now before us, is not what we can justifiably say "fills the bill." It does not do the things that are most needed by the farmer, and that is a low rate of interest on the refinancing of his loans.

It is needless for me to tell this House of Representatives the condition that our farmers are now in. His place is one almost of pitiful servitude; he is without purchasing power to buy the necessities of his household; he can feed but he cannot clothe his family properly or give his children adequate education for the lack of the essentials that are necessary. Many thousands have already lost their farms, have become tenant farmers, other thousands have heavy mortgage obligations, and are steeped in debt with delinquent taxes. The American farmer is almost beyond redemption. He needs sound governmental action.

I tell you the farmers of this country know what they want in the way of legislation. Farm delegations have spoken to me and many of us here and have expressed a desire for adequate financial legislation. They have appealed for the passing of the Frazier bill for refinancing farm mortgages at the rate of 1½ percent and 1½ percent principal on the amortization.

They ask for and need a low rate of interest. The rate embodied in this administration bill I feel is too high. It is still oppressive, and the only redeeming feature is the 5-year breathing spell it offers. They asked to be placed on a parity that Government has given industry and manufacturing. They are but seeking governmental protection and say, "Congress, you have given 'big business' of this country billions of dollars. You have upheld private industry when they have appealed to you. You have gone to the rescue of the corporations and monopolies, and now we ask you to help us, the American farmer. We ask you to give us low rates of interest on our farm mortgages, and we ask you to set a cost of production so that we may be able to earn a little on our investment and enjoy some purchasing power."

The farmer has been the victim of campaign promises for more than 8 years. He was told by previous administrations that adequate legislation would be given him. These previous administrations have failed utterly and abysmally in this respect. They have sidetracked the farmer, and by a series of events he has been forced to sell his products at a low level never before reached in the history of this country. Now we have a "new deal" in the White House, and I honestly believe that the President is anxious to help the farmer. I really believe he is desirous of doing the right thing for agriculture.

I am going to vote for this bill, although I feel that the proper relief is not promised for the farmer. I believe that the interest rates in this bill will not give the average farmer the relief he needs, and I feel that the issuance of bonds instead of Federal Reserve notes is a mistake, and I would like sincerely to see the Frazier bill for refinancing substituted for this one.

The international bankers have led unthinking people to believe that if the Frazier bill were passed there would be too much money in circulation. Our present miserable condition is due entirely to the fact that there is not enough money in circulation to do the money-work. Economists tell us that there ought to be $50 per capita in circulation in the United States, but, as a matter of fact, there is not over $5 per capita in actual circulation among the people. We do not care how many billions a few racketeers may have locked up or hidden away. That is not in circulation. These unreasoning people, parrotlike, use the Wall Street expression and talk glibly about "soft money" and "flat money", when they have not the faintest conception of what money is and what its purposes and functions are. Parrotlike they repeat these words without knowing what they mean. There are still a few foolish enough to talk of a gold standard, but if they will go and take a Federal Reserve note to the United States Treasury and ask for gold, they will find that the United States is not on a gold standard and that this paper will not be redeemed in gold. In fact, the United States is so far off the gold standard that it is a crime for you to have gold in your possession. That is as it ought to be. Paper money representing services and the promise of our Government to redeem it in services and commodities is good enough for any intelligent man or woman. If these critics would stop and think and inform themselves on the subject of money, they would discover that our Government prints Federal Reserve notes and gives them to the Federal Reserve bank for the international banking clique at seven tenths of 1 cent per bill—the cost of printing. This bill may be for $1 or for $1,000, and all that the Federal Reserve bank pays Uncle Sam is seven tenths of 1 cent per bill, and it can be kept for 1 year or for 10 years.

They would discover that at present their Uncle Sam has, printed and outstanding, approximately four billion of this paper money, which the international bankers get through the Federal Reserve bank for the cost of printing—seven tenths of 1 cent per bill. They would discover that the larger portion of these Federal Reserve notes have been recently issued to a few large cities in the eastern part of the United States.

When these big boys get it it is not fiat or soft money. Just a few days ago we printed $2,000,000,000 to give to the big banks, but because we charged them one half of 1 percent tax per annum, and because they have no further paper securities, and because the poor devils who they have been charging usury rates of interest have no further securities or homes to mortgage, they all having been mortgaged heretofore, they refuse to take it. What would be the matter with loaning that $2,000,000,000 to the farmers through the Frazier bill? The farmers would be glad to pay one half of 1 percent tax on it, and they can give real security—first mortgages on their farms.

When the big boys get it it is not fiat or soft money, but when the farmers or the soldiers ask for two billion of Federal Reserve notes on the same terms and conditions that the international bankers get them, then these bankers and their unintelligent followers begin to yell "fiat money" and "soft money." It is sound money when your Government gives it to the banking clique for the cost of printing; and then when the Government gets four or five billion dollars in the red, borrows its own money back and pays 2- 3- and 4-percent interest on it, then it is sound money in the minds of the bankers and unreasoning people.

Again, the national-bank notes are based on debts and not on gold or silver. This, Wall Street never explains to its followers. The people think that these notes are based upon gold. The truth is that money is but a unit of exchange, a yardstick with which we do business and exchange goods and other commodities. There are not enough units or yardsticks to go around. That is why 90 percent of the homes and public buildings in this Nation need painting and repairs. If the owners of these buildings had money enough to buy the paint and hire the painters, the farmers' flax would go up to two or three dollars per bushel overnight. They would not be able to raise enough flax in the next 5 years to supply flax for linseed oil used in paints. This depression is due to the fact that we have not enough money with which to do business; therefore we in Minnesota are for the Frazier bill, which provides that the United States Government shall refinance existing farm indebtedness at 1½ percent interest and 1½ percent principal on the amortization plan, not by issuing bonds but by issuing Federal Reserve notes secured by first mortgages on farms, the best security on earth.

During the war the Government increased the money in circulation by giving to the people about $2,000,000,000 new money—Federal Reserve notes—to use as a revolving fund with which to buy billions of dollars of Liberty bonds. Then, in 1920 and 1921, it deflated and took $2,000,000,000 away from the people in the short time of 8 months and wrecked the prosperity of the Nation. That is when the deflation began. We farmers have been selling the things that we have been producing below the cost of production since 1921. We have lost all our equities and all our savings, and now the depression has reached the business people. When the Government gave us $2,000,000,000 to buy Liberty bonds it was not fiat or soft money, but when we now ask for $2,000,000,000 to use as a revolving fund with which to refinance 9½ billion dollars of farm indebtedness, then it becomes soft money in the minds of Wall Street and unthinking people.

I cannot understand how any person who is fairly well informed on what money is, and its functions, should be afraid that if the Frazier bill were passed that then there would be too much money in circulation, when, as a matter of fact, the average individual that parrotlike repeats the expression "fiat money" and "soft money" is generally a poor boob that has not $2.50 in his pocket or even enough to buy a meal. Just why he is so foolish as to use the Wall Street language I cannot understand.

If we would only open our eyes and look about and calmly view the wreckage—whole communities without banking facilities, 80 percent of the homes and buildings of this Nation unpainted and in sad need of repairs, millions without work and millions more starving, and all because we have not enough money, enough yardsticks, with which to do business and exchange our goods and services—then we would realize that we must have an expansion of currency; that we must refinance the farm indebtedness; that we must have more money. The Frazier bill will do all these things.

We farm representatives are not satisfied with the so-called "administration bill." We believe it to be a bankers' bill. We do not believe that it meets the expectations and hopes given by the President's inaugural address. We feel that the President should consult with the real farm leaders, such as John Simpson, and with the farm representatives of agricultural States.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this bill, modifying and supplementing as it does the farm loan bill of 1916, have been well designed for the purposes and ends in view. I believe that when the bill we have before us becomes a law it will be found sound and practical from a business standpoint—that the $2,000,000,000 of bonds which it authorizes will be readily taken by individuals and corporations all over the country who want safety as well as a reasonable income from their investment. These bonds will yield 4 percent interest, free from taxes, with interest payments guaranteed by the Government.

Thousands of farmers with burdens of mortgage and other debts too great to be borne longer will be encouraged to borrow or refinance mortgages under the provisions of the bill with the hope ultimately that they may work out and save their farms and gain for themselves a measure of peace—a feeling of security which they have not had for many years. Many will go forward inspired with hope of owning again, free from debt, the farms and homes whose ownership are now about to slip from their hands.

Mr. Speaker, it is cause for regret to me that a lower rate than 4½ per cent interest might not have been provided for the money loaned, because the mortgagor who cannot now pay 6 percent and 7 percent, as he is required to pay in many instances, cannot pay the rate provided of 4½ percent. I think the rate should have been fixed at from 2 to 3 percent. I am well aware, however, that bonds must be sold to get the money for loaning purposes—that a reasonable return in interest must be provided for those who buy the bonds. The Government is undertaking to provide for safety in operation of the farm-loan banks and the farm-loan association through which the money is to be loaned. Safe farm-loan banking cannot be done unless proper margins of safety are provided for the banks' operations. The farmer, as well as those who buy the bonds for investment, the public generally, will want to feel that there is proper security behind every loan and that the one half of 1 percent interest charged the farmer in excess of the interest on the bonds is to provide security for the banks. So, however much we may have wished for a lower rate of interest to the farmer, we will abide by and accept the judgment of the President and of the Secretary of Agriculture and of the great farmers' organizations who have given the measure their best thought. They and those who framed the bill have been deeply anxious to offer a measure which would furnish the largest amount of relief to the farmer consistent with good business policies, considering conditions of money markets and other factors entering into the whole proposition.

With a view of lightening the farmer's burden as much as possible until he shall be able to get better prices for his products, it is provided that he does not have to pay any part of the principal within a period of 5 years from the date of his borrowing or refinancing. Under the provisions of the Farm Act of 1916, he can borrow for or extend his loan for periods ranging from 5 to 40 years. If he cannot pay the interest on the mortgage at the rate provided, his case will, no doubt, prove hopeless and his farm will be lost. I wish to state that unless the prices of farm products are brought to a higher level than has obtained for the last 2 years there will be no hope for thousands who will borrow and refinance to ever pay out.

The bill provides that the rate of 4½ percent is open to none save members of farm associations. One may make a loan although not a member, but he must pay 5 percent for the money. It is provided, however, that when as many as 10 borrowers living in the same locality shall altogether be borrowers of as much as $20,000 they shall at once form an association and shall get the full benefit of the 4½ percent rate.

It is hardly possible within the limit of time and space permitted to give the full details of the plan. I have studied its provisions as closely as the short time since its introduction has permitted, and I believe it lays the foundation in its provision for thousands of farmers who are now utterly discouraged and confronted with ruin to commence to rehabilitate their ruined financial condition.

Mr. Speaker, I know my own district, its people, and their condition better than other sections. There are 12 counties in my district, which by the Federal census of 1930 had a population of 194,915. Since 1920 it has lost 10,078 people, or 4.9 percent. The State of Tennessee showed for the same period a gain in population of 11.9 percent. This district is almost wholly agricultural—only 15.75 percent of its population reside in its incorporated towns. There were, all told, 2,037 persons listed as being employed in industrial pursuits. Many of those classified as industrial workers were employees of garages in the capacity of mechanics, others were employed by railroads, telephone and electric companies, and a large percent of the whole in mills processing wheat, corn, timber, and lumber, while others were employed in plants for processing milk and tobacco. Practically the entire population depends directly or indirectly upon agriculture for a living.

In this district are 26,437 farms with a total acreage of 2,510,770 acres. Mortgages aggregating $6,458,206 rest on 4,151 farms operated by full owners, according to the census. This does not take into account the farms operated by tenants and part owners. It is reasonably safe to say that there are not less than 8,000 mortgaged farms in the district, the aggregate mortgage indebtedness being not less than $12,000,000. Hundreds of mortgages have been foreclosed during the last year and many former owners have sought residence away from the scene of their misfortune and humiliation, others have become tenants, and some are working on highways on money furnished by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to relieve the distress consequent upon unemployment. Tenancy has grown in this district from 36.9 percent in 1920 to 44 percent in 1930. Loss in population, increase of mortgage indebtedness, of tenancy, depletion of savings accounts, the sale of breeding stock, worn-out machinery and equipment, used-up savings, borrowing or cancelation of life-insurance policies, inability to buy and pay for books for school children, to pay for medical and dental attention, to pay the increasing burden of taxes, all of these make up a part of the evil consequences that have befallen great numbers of a once happy, contented, and prosperous farming people. Many who only a few years ago were accounted highly prosperous and were classed as being rich are today greatly reduced in finances and confronted with ruin.

Mr. Speaker, these people of whom I speak lived in a section unusually favored by nature. Several of the counties in this district are known throughout the United States, have been made famous by the fertility of their soil, the beauty of the country with its rich bluegrass, for its famed strains of blue-blooded Jersey cattle, of pacing and trotting horses, and better known for an unsurpassed citizenship.

It is to be deplored that the best students of governmental affairs have no specific remedy to offer for the immediate relief of those adverse conditions.

The President offered the farm emergency relief bill, which has the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, leaders of great farm organizations, of men capable of careful and well-considered thought, of those sincerely anxious to help the farmers. The House passed it after the President had frankly stated that he was asking us to follow "untrod paths" in an effort to serve agriculture, and, if possible, to save it. I voted for the bill as I will for any measure that gives promise of agricultural relief.

Mr. Speaker, this farm-mortgage measure is a companion bill of the farm relief bill. In the Senate they have been combined into one bill. I believe the farm mortgage bill to be workable. I hope the untrod path we shall enter in carrying out the farm relief bill will lead us to better conditions. If it does not after due trial, the President has stated that he will be the first to say so.

The time was ripe for action—indeed, action in behalf of agriculture was long overdue. To act and fail is better than not to act at all.

Mr. Speaker, the conditions prevailing in my own district are not different from those of others all over the United States. From every section the conditions are represented as bad and the demand for relief is insistent. It is only now and then that a public man or newspaper gives utterance to expressions other than that of sympathy. Practically everyone realizes that until the farmers are again able to carry on and sell above the cost of production, business will not and cannot be restored.

A few days ago a once brilliantly edited New York paper, whose latter-day clientele is among the predatory international bankers and Wall Street speculators, carried this solemn warning to those seeking farmers' relief:

A solution could be formed more readily if agriculture could be induced to make up its mind that there is no way out except the one through which other forms of business must go—that of patience, thrift, labor, and economy, with the lopping off of unprofitable production and the elimination of enterprises which have become impaired beyond hope of recovery. No business can go on indefinitely by borrowing new money to pay old debts. Agriculture has no more right than any other industry to do 1933 business on a 1919 basis. If the farmers and their professional friends at Washington cannot be brought to realize this, care should be taken to make sure that in refinancing State and Federal aid shall be confined to sound undertakings for reducing interests and postponing maturities.

This newspaper, ever mindful of its international banking friends, of its Wall Street friends, of protected interests, voicing their sentiments and beliefs, would have the farmers practice patience—as if the farmers' whole life had not taught him that great virtue. He calmly waits for the proper season for plowing and preparing his lands for planting; he waits for the grain he plants to germinate, for its tiny shoots to break through the soil. He is patient in waiting for the rains and for the lands to dry out for cultivation. He, better than any other who labors, knows that he is powerless to hurry up the forces of nature. He waits with calmness and patience for the season of maturity—patience is ingrained in his very nature. This great editor says he must be thrifty. Out of the abundant wealth he has acquired from selling wheat at 50 cents per bushel, corn at 15 to 20 cents, cotton at 5 cents and 6 cents, he must save, he must invest, he must add to his wealth. Then, above all, he must be economical. When his worn-out shoes can no longer be worn he can save the price of a new pair by going barefooted—he and his family can cut out the use of coffee and sugar; but, above all, he must lop off all unprofitable production. That means, under present conditions, he should lop off the cultivation of wheat, corn, oats, rye, cotton, and all the farm crops—lop off his orchards, quit growing livestock, quit dairying; in fact, according to this great leader of international thought, he must lop off the farm itself as an enterprise which, with conditions continued as they are, is an enterprise beyond recovery.

Mr. Speaker, the farmer is not asking that his business in 1933 be put on a 1919 basis. He is asking that all restrictions be removed which prevent him from having an equal opportunity with industry, with bankers, and those engaged in other pursuits.

Those who brought forward the farm relief bill, and who have proposed this mortgage bill believe that farmers should have such relief as will permit them to receive the prices for their products in the period of 1909 to 1914. This period is chosen because farmers then could sell their products for reasonable prices, above the cost of production—they could take the money and buy equipment and the necessities of life at prices in near relation to the prices of their farm products.

Mr. Speaker, in my native county where I have my home and where I own and operate farm lands, there are great areas of wide-spread, rich bottom lands on the rivers which overflow annually, and, for that reason, are cultivated in corn. No cornlands of the West are more fertile or productive than these overflow lands. Last fall when corn could be sold at all, it sold for about 15 cents per bushel. Wheat sold, delivered to mill, at 50 cents per bushel. Eggs sold as low as 3 cents per dozen. Such prices are ruinous. Shall we stand idly by and see agriculture perish, see the farms of the country pass into the hands of insurance companies, and present farm owners turned into tenants, or shall we make an effort to rescue them from their perilous situation?

I believe that until the farmer is put in the way of recovery, normal business will not return. The idle wheels of industry will remain so. Transportation and commerce will languish and die. The paramount duty of this administration and of this Congress is to pass and put into effect laws for mortgage relief such as this bill offers; to put into operation the farmers' relief measure; to repeal and change every law and regulation that has helped other lines of business at the farmer's expense. In other words, to treat the great business of farming as basic, as lying at the very foundation of all that we call "prosperity"—foster it, relieve it of unjust burdens—aid it, and let the blessings that would come to agriculture from this course flow out into the channels of commerce and trade, whose veins and arteries are now clogged because of the lack of the lifeblood which the farmers cannot any longer supply without cooperation.

Mr. AYERS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, the very life of this Nation depends upon the issues involved in this bill. The most important of such issues are, first, the refinancing of existing farm mortgages; second, the extension of credit to the farmer who cannot otherwise secure credit; third, it is the first legislation ever to come before a Congress to aid the farmer in redeeming or repurchasing the lands taken from him on execution or foreclosure sale into which his and his family's very lifeblood has been given; and, fourth, it authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to loan to State irrigation districts with completed projects in order to reduce and refinance outstanding indebtedness. To this extent it sounds the chord and speaks the language the farmer understands.

MUST HAVE LOWER INTEREST RATE

To make this law effective we must have a long-range program and a low rate of interest. In the bill before us the range of time may be extended to 40 years; that feature is satisfactory, but the interest rate is highly unsatisfactory—in fact, it is prohibitive. My colleagues, I tell you that agriculture absolutely cannot live under a 5-percent interest rate; and if we can refinance financial institutions and transportation companies at a lesser rate, then certainly we can refinance the basic industry of this Nation at a lesser rate. The 5 percent rate written in this bill should be cut in two; indeed, it must be cut in two, and money can be had at half that rate, even if it has to be conscripted or commandeered. As a matter of fact, it is now being commandeered for centralization by the financial interests of the country. Why not the Government take a hand in that game and play that hand for the common good of all?

That the farmer have a price above the cost of production is absolutely necessary for his existence, and for that reason it is necessary that the principles of the Frazier bill be written in the agriculture bill over in the Senate, and I hope the Wheeler silver bill will also be attached to it. The Frazier bill takes the cost of production as the basis for price fixing, and the Wheeler bill is the only true system of inflation.

But my enthusiasm for these matters of legitimate relief has led me from my subject—lower interest rates. At this instant all the farmers and the ranchers of this Nation are looking for, demanding, and expecting a rate of interest which they can pay. They are honest, and they are anxious to pay—nothing pleases them any more than to pay their debts—but how can they pay when their products' price is less than the cost of production and, in addition to that, they have an unbearable rate of interest written against them?

Now, Mr. Speaker, if news goes out to them that we have failed to fix a price on their products in excess of production costs, and if that news shows that we have written 5 percent interest against them, and if that news further shows that we have frowned on the silver bill and that we have failed of an inflation program, then I warn you that it will breed germs of rebellion in their hearts, and it will retard the confidence that has been manifest since March 4. On the other hand, if we fix their price, based on production cost, and if we adjust the currency so as to fix a true range of value, and if we write into this bill an interest rate which they can pay, then the great army of producers will "come back" with a strong heart and maintain their first-rank place in this Nation.

By this bill the Government is fostering a $2,000,000,000 bond issue for refinancing agriculture. The purpose is one of decentralization, and to replace the money in the afflicted communities and take as security self-liquidating, long-time, low-interest-rate mortgages from the farmers, ranchers, and allied industries.

Do not say this cannot be done, for it can be done and it must be done if prosperity is ever returned. And a low interest rate is not 5 percent. The farmer cannot pay that. It is too high. Half that amount is more in keeping with the spirit of the bill.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD to include a speech delivered by my colleague, Mr. Goss, on the subject of national defense.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HARTLEY]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

ADDRESS OF HON. EDWARD W. GOSS, OF CONNECTICUT, BEFORE THE VETERANS' ORGANIZATIONS AT HARTFORD, CONN., APRIL 6, 1933

Gentlemen, I am delighted at this opportunity to address the veterans' organizations of Connecticut on the subject of national defense. Before such an audience it is unnecessary to point out the importance of my subject. You gave conclusive proof of your convictions in this matter and your readiness to stand by them 16 years ago when you donned your country's uniform and offered your lives in her defense.

Go back with me for a moment to those fateful days of 1917. How many of us had any idea of what we were up against? I confess that when I enlisted I had very vague ideas of what was expected of me, and I knew still less of how I should go about meeting the situation. The same was true of us as a nation. We had been forced into a war with a world power. Though it seemed incredible that a nation like ours, whose aims and aspirations lay wholly along paths of peace, should find itself at swords' points with a European power, we suddenly found ourselves in that very situation.

I recall our early groping attempts to help the Allies. At first it seemed that in the absence of any considerable trained man power of our own, our activities must of necessity be restricted to supplying the sinews and munitions of war. Then suddenly German military successes made it imperative that allied armies be greatly augmented. What resources in trained man power did the United States have available? Including the Regular Army and all National Guardsmen who had seen Federal service along the Mexican border, our total trained man power numbered some 200,000 men. But in 1917 Great Britain alone had 10 times that number serving in her expeditionary forces, while a far greater number labored in Britain to sustain the effort on the front. Obviously, we were forced in this emergency to turn to our great reservoir of untrained man power. What plans had been made to raise, train, and equip large armies in the United States? None! In our great desire to maintain strict neutrality our military leaders had been forbidden to make any preparations against possible involvement of the United States. As a nation we had never visualized such a pressing necessity. These tremendous tasks had to be undertaken hastily, with improvised methods and all the tremendous losses incident to such methods.

In spite of lack of planned preparation, the accomplishments of those days were memorable. The United States, under stress of extraordinary circumstances, achieved results that had previously been considered impossible. But I insist that thousands of lives and countless treasure would have been saved if the Nation had been ready 16 years ago with adequate plans and preparations to meet its baptism of fire. The lives that were lost can never be replaced. The national debt, incurred when vast sums were of necessity recklessly expended, still weighs down the Nation with a depressing load of taxation.

In 1920 the Congress took steps to insure that our experiences in the war with Germany should never be repeated. It formulated and passed an amended National Defense Act designed to insure the safety of the United States from any armed aggression. This act reflected the seasoned judgment of the men who had just led our Nation through the greatest conflict in history. It was written in the blood of thousands of Americans who had fallen in defense of their country—written while the acrid smell of gunpowder was still in the air.

In providing for an adequate national defense, our Nation's leaders realized the basic importance of trained manpower. Uniforms, equipment, and weapons are the tools of the military trade, and of course no workman is efficient without good tools. But the first requisite is the trained worker—in this case, the trained soldier. Accordingly, the National Defense Act provided for an adequate nucleus of trained manpower and made provisions for expanding this nucleus to meet the requirements of any particular situation. The professional soldiers of the Regular Army and the civilian soldiers of the National Guard and the Organized Reserve were made the framework of our defensive structure.

This was a typically American solution to a very vexing problem. It was economical, and while it avoided building up a large professional military machine, it was admirably suited to our defensive needs. Such a system is not suitable for offensive purposes. An offensive force must be well prepared by long training and adequate equipment to deliver a powerful surprise attack at the very outbreak of war. Hence our system, depending so largely on civilian components and upon armies to be raised and trained only after emergency has arisen, does not engender fear in neighboring nations.

Provisions were also made for obtaining an adequate supply of the munitions of warfare. With the same clear vision displayed in attacking the problem of trained man power, the National Defense Act provided for an adequate mobilization of the industrial resources of the Nation. The need for this was great. I have spoken of the great amount of money we expended in our military effort in the World War. In that conflict contracts for munitions were placed promptly with all firms that appeared capable of manufacturing them. No expense was spared in rushing these orders to completion. But in spite of our best efforts no American-made 75's were firing on the battle front when the armistice was signed. We were still dependent on our Allies for artillery and ammunition and for many other items. So the National Defense Act provides not only for the prompt mobilization of our military man power but also for a reasonably prompt flow of munitions to our citizen armies in time of emergency. When this memorable piece of legislation was enacted the future safety of the Nation seemed assured.

Great thought was given to the size of the trained and partly trained components that our situation required. It was finally determined that our defensive needs would be adequately met by a Regular Army of 298,000 and a federally recognized National Guard of 490,000 if provision were made to expand this force promptly through the agency of the Organized Reserves. At that time we were not greatly concerned over our naval situation since the United States was then building the greatest fleet in existence.

That was our situation in 1920. Today, 13 years later, we find that great changes have occurred. On the one hand we have many ominous indications that the "war to end war" failed to accomplish its purpose. On the other hand our defensive strength has, for a number of reasons, greatly deteriorated from the standard determined upon in 1920 as essential to national safety. Our position as the world's greatest naval power was traded for a naval treaty. Our Regular Army has been repeatedly reduced in the name of economy so that today its strength is much less than one half the figure authorized in 1920. The National Guard has never reached the strength specified. Instead of 490,000, we have approximately 190,000 National Guardsmen. At the present time the United States, the wealthiest nation in the world, has a smaller military force than Greece or Belgium or Portugal. We actually stand seventeenth in point of organized strength among the nations of the world.

Tonight I say to you that it behooves us to pause and take stock of our ability to defend ourselves. The experience of 1917 must not be repeated. It was costly then; if repeated, it might well be fatal. The safety of the Nation is in our hands. The country looks to the veterans of the last conflict for counsel and guidance in matters of national defense. What shall we tell them?

Here is the message I would deliver: First, economy in national defense, when carried beyond the point of safety, is the most reckless form of extravagance. No amount of expenditure after the emergency is upon us can atone for pinch-penny savings in time of peace. We cannot pour gold into a hopper and grind it out immediately in the form of trained soldiers and needed equipment. Second, in spite of countless mechanical devices and chemical mixtures, the only sound basis for adequate defense is trained and disciplined man power. Finally, even in these times of economic stringency, the provisions of the National Defense Act should be departed from only after the possible consequences of such action have been most carefully weighed. Our national defense policy must never be measured primarily in terms of dollars and cents, but in terms of men.

Upon the veteran falls the task of molding public opinion on these important matters and bringing to the attention of his representatives in Congress the continuing necessity for a strong national defense. In the last great military emergency the public learned to look with confidence to you for protection against impending danger. Today in matters of national defense your counsel has an unchallenged authority. With that authority goes the responsibility that leadership entails. I call upon you to see that the security of America is safeguarded.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. KLEBERG, for 1 day, on account of illness.

To Mr. HIGGINS, for several days, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. KEE, for 5 days, on account of important business.

THE DISCHARGE RULE—HOW LEADING MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE REGARDED IT 2 YEARS AGO

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include therein certain excerpts from speeches and addresses made by Members of the House at the opening of the Seventy-second Congress with reference to the discharge rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, persistent rumor has had it that an effort would be made to amend the present discharge rule so that a majority of the Membership of this body would be required in order to discharge any committee from the further consideration of any bill. The present number required is 145, and that rule has been in operation from the time it was adopted at the beginning of the last session.

So that the large number of incoming Representatives in the Seventy-third Congress may have the benefit of the advice of House leaders at the time the rule was considered and adopted, and so that they may not be misled into binding themselves irrevocably until they have possession of the full facts, I have secured permission to extend my remarks and to include therein portions of the addresses of my colleagues at that time. They may be found in their entirety by consulting the daily RECORD under date of Thursday, December 8, 1931.

Let me first add the observation that what was then true is now increasingly true. It is difficult to understand why the rule designed to insure liberal and fair and orderly procedure that would truly reflect the majority will, at the same time that it adequately protected the rights of any considerable minority, should be practically destroyed just now when the majority strength is so preponderant that it should have more than a safe margin of support for any measure that had even a semblance of merit, and should be able to resist any application of the rule unless there might be a clear effort to thwart expression upon a major issue.

Members who record themselves, if and when the test comes, in favor of a change in this rule such as has been proposed, should realize the gravity of their action and its far-reaching effect when judged by the excerpts from the addresses which I append.

Listen first to the remarks of our distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Rules, who also then presided over that powerful committee. I subscribe to them now, as I did then. He said, in his usual frank and forceful manner:

Mr. Speaker, 31 years ago I was a Member of this House under what I may term a 1-man oligarchy. For 10 years following my entrance into the House the House of Representatives had tied itself hand and foot and delivered itself to the Speaker. The House was under the control of a Committee on Rules, composed of three men—the Speaker, a gentleman from his side of the House, and one man from the minority side.

Time and again I have seen the Speaker call the majority member back of the Speaker's desk and decide upon a rule, and, after agreeing upon the rule, they would notify the minority member what was done, and the Republican member would read his rule, sometimes written in longhand on the back of an envelope, and the House would proceed to act.

I actually saw this, Mr. Speaker. It is hard to believe, but the records of the House will bear me out. I saw the two majority members of the Committee on Rules report a rule to this House for the consideration of a measure, and when the rule was adopted and the language of the rule was carefully examined, bless goodness, they found it not only provided for the consideration of the measure but actually passed the measure. [Laughter.]

There has been constant protest against this manner of considering legislation. The protest has continued all during the years. After 1910, when the Democrats came into power in this body, there was considerable liberalization of the rules, and now the Democratic caucus has agreed upon what is known as the Crisp discharge rule, and I was instructed to report that as an amendment to the rules of the House, which I took pleasure in doing.

This discharge rule provides for the discharge of committees, under certain circumstances. It even provides for the discharge of the Committee on Rules. I have no objection to that. As long as I am at the head of the Rules Committee there is not going to be any "sitting on the lid." [Applause.] I am willing at any time, if any gentleman thinks the Rules Committee is attempting to stifle legislation, to have you put your discharge rule into operation. This is also what the proposed change does with respect to other committees. I may say that this matter will be discussed in detail by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Crisp] and, perhaps, by other gentlemen on this side.

The Crisp discharge rule also provides, in another paragraph, for the calling together of committees where the chairman refuses to call the committee together. Surely, nobody objects to this.

* * * * * * *

Another provision of the Crisp rule is that providing for action by the conferees when they refuse to act. Surely, nobody can object to that. These are the three high spots in the Crisp amendment to the rules of the House—the discharge of committees, the calling of committees together, and compelling the conferees to act.

Now, gentlemen, a good deal has been said about amendments to this Crisp amendment to the rules. We are willing to stand or fall by the action taken by the Democratic caucus. I believe an overwhelming majority of the House is in favor of the proposed liberalization of the rules. I will say that if the discharge rule is not workable then the Rules Committee will promptly give consideration to any amendment that may be deemed necessary to make the discharge rule workable. [Applause.]

Next came Judge Crisp, of Georgia, long recognized as one of the ablest of parliamentarians to sit in this Chamber, and at that time recognized as cherishing the desire and determination to make of the House a representative body, responsive to the will of the electorate. He said in opening his remarks:

Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, this is the day I long have looked forward to—a Democratic Speaker, this House under Democratic rule, carrying out the great principle of democracy that a majority shall rule, and the adoption of rules with sufficient authority and so adjusted that they shall be rules for the entire House, not to meet any political exigency of any party but to insure the fundamental right of democracy that a majority of the House may work its will under the terms of those rules. [Applause.]

Later, in amplification, he added this detailed explanation, which is worthy of preservation and which may profitably be considered now:

I propose another very vital fundamental change to insure the majority control which the Republican conference did not act upon, to wit, a rule making it possible to deal with recalcitrant conferees, and make them subject to and amenable to this House, that rule being that when conferees shall have been appointed for 20 days and shall not have made a report, it shall be a privileged motion to move to discharge them and to appoint new conferees and to instruct. The rule provides also that during the last 6 days of a session those rights to discharge and instruct and appoint new conferees can be made after the conferees have been appointed for 36 hours. You all recall how in Congresses past the conferees defied the House on the Norris "lame-duck" resolution, how they defied it on Muscle Shoals, and how they defied it during the last hours of the last session on the bill for the veterans' hospital. Under the old rules if nine tenths of the Members of this House desired to instruct conferees, they are impotent as babies to do so unless the Speaker would recognize them to move to suspend the rules or the Committee on Rules would bring in a resolution authorizing the House to deal with them. Is that democratic or is it consistent with the American form of government? No. Under the rule proposed today you have them absolutely within the control and authority of this House.

I come now to the remaining fundamental, the discharge rule, and it is, word for word, the rule that I proposed, to discharge committees, when I was in the minority last January. That rule has two separate, distinct methods of procedure to discharge the committee, not related to each other, absolutely divorced from each other, and a Member can proceed to discharge the committee under either one of those methods. The Republican conference adopted one of those methods, the weaker method for discharge. They liberalized as little as possible to meet their political exigencies. They adopted the old rule that I had the honor of drawing in the Sixty-eighth Congress under which the Howell-Barkley bill was discharged and which was filibustered in the House so that we could never get action. Why? Because the Speaker and those in the chair entertained dilatory motions, would not bring the matter to a conclusion, permitted delays, and the bill could not be finally passed, and I then learned my lesson. I profited by that experience. I knew that history might repeat itself. I determined to evolve, to the very best of my ability, a rule that could not be filibustered, that could not be circumvented, giving the House a chance to discharge a committee and put a bill on its passage; and the second method in this rule which you have before you today will absolutely accomplish that purpose. The Republican conference even weakened that first method, because, while they say it shall be unfinished business, they have an innocent little clause in there saying it does not supervene the right to make a preferential motion, when it is up, to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider appropriation or revenue bills. That weakness even is not in the first method proposed in the rule the Democrats present to you for consideration.

Subsequently he added this reminder:

Now, I would like especially to stress to my friends of the press that 145 does not discharge a committee. The opponents of this rule say that that 145 would permit "unbaked legislation." Such is not the case. The 145 is simply the number necessary to initiate the right for the House itself to vote twice a month as to whether or not it will discharge a committee. To discharge a committee it would be necessary to have a majority of the Membership of the House voting, a quorum being present. As this rule can only come up 2 days in a month, the motion to discharge will have to be on the calendar 7 days, and the Membership of the House will know it, will be here, and, in my judgment, it will always require 200 or more voting in the affirmative to discharge a committee, but it is within the power of the 145 to put the House on record.

And again:

There is one provision that the Republican rule does not affect The rules which I propose will also deal with this situation: Suppose a committee reports favorably to the House a public bill. It is not privileged, and you cannot get it up for consideration. This rule says you can file against the Rules Committee a special rule, making it in order to consider that bill favorably reported and on the calendar, which the responsible authorities will not allow to come up. It puts it in the power of the House to work its will. It puts it in the power of the minority to work out its program and have the House go on record, and it is the duty of the majority to take that responsibility.

I welcome the minority's program. I hope you will propose one. This rule gives you an opportunity to do so. If it is like your programs in the past, I am quite willing to vote against it, and our majority will vote against it, and yet you can have your record known to the country.

That is all these rules will do. They are democratic. They put it in the power of the majority of this House to carry out its will, whether that majority is made up of Democrats, Progressives, Republicans, or any other party. These rules are made in keeping with the spirit of democracy, in keeping with the spirit of the Constitution of the United States that the majority may rule; and with these rules there can be no hue and cry throughout the land that the House of Representatives is gagged by a triumvirate. [Applause.]

Let me now quote just a brief paragraph from the remarks of Major LaGuardia. He needs no eulogy here; even his political enemies freely confess that it is nothing short of a national calamity that the Nation has been deprived of his services in this Congress, of all Congresses. He stated:

Gentlemen, there is a great deal of misapprehension going through the country as to the discharge rule. I still believe that 100 is the logical number, but it is wrong to send out propaganda that 100 men can control the House. All that this rule does is to give 145 Members of the House power to offset anything that 13 members of a committee now have the power to do. This is all there is to it. In other words, under existing rules, 13 members of a committee may prevent this House from considering a bill, although a majority desires its consideration. This change provides the machinery whereby 145 men can move the 13 members of a committee and bring the bill before the House.

Next to testify was CANNON, in whom this House has learned to recognize a master of parliamentary procedure, and a gentleman of liberal thought as well. Twitting one of his colleagues across the aisle on a belated conversion to the belief in the desirability of, and need for, such a rule, Representative CANNON observed:

> "When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
> When the devil was well, the devil a monk was he."

He then added:

* * * the need of some practical method of discharging committees refusing to report meritorious legislation has been the storm center about which parliamentary battles have been waged in practically every adoption of the rules for the last 2 decades.

In the pending resolution we have the solution of the problem. Here at last is a workable rule. Here is a provision under which recalcitrant committees, whether standing committees or committees of conference, may be discharged, and the House afforded an opportunity for the discussion of measures it desires to consider. It is a provision which conforms to every requirement of the ideal rule. It permits the majority to legislate when it desires to legislate. And it safeguards the rights of the minority. These two qualifications constitute the highest test to which a rule may be subjected. The resolution merits the support of Members on both sides of the aisle. It removes the last obstacle to the complete democratization of the rules of the House.

The debate was fittingly closed by the grand old man from Illinois, Judge SABATH, also a member of the Committee on Rules, who said in part:

When I entered the House Uncle Joe Cannon was its Speaker. At that time the rules of the House gave him full power not only to appoint the committees, but also complete power over what we like to point to with pride as the greatest legislative body in the world.

At that time the Speaker was the House; but in 1910, during the Sixty-first session of Congress, with the aid of the press and a few true progressives from Wisconsin, after a most determined fight, which was tantamount to a revolution of procedure, under the leadership of our then leader, Champ Clark, our present Speaker, John N. Garner, the present majority leader, Henry T. Rainey, Claude Kitchin, and Judge Shackleford, of Missouri, we succeeded in amending the rules and in freeing the Membership from the tyrannical rule and dictatorship of the then Speaker.

Today, after 22 years, thanks to the Democratic majority, we again have a chance and an opportunity to liberalize the rules and to relieve the Membership from the extremely restrictive and established rulings which have been in effect the last 10 years of Republican rule.

To me, who continually demanded the liberalization of these rules, it is a great satisfaction that we are about to protect the Members in their rights and privileges so long denied them. For not only was the House often at the mercy of the Speaker but also at the mercy of the conferees and of the various chairmen of the committees.

If the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina will carry—and I know it will—the House can, yes, will secure action and the Members the right to vote on any bill or resolution. No longer will it be possible for the Chairman of the Rules Committee to walk about with pockets full of rules reported by the committee and refusing to call them up. Nor will it be possible for any chairman of any committee to willfully and deliberately refuse to call up a bill reported by that particular committee or to refuse to call a meeting, notwithstanding the fact that the majority of the members of that committee may desire to meet. Nor will the conferees deprive the House of the right to express itself on any proposition in disagreement.

Therefore I must repeat, it is amusing to me to hear some of you gentlemen demand a further liberalization of the rules.

As one who for nearly a quarter of a century has continually demanded such liberalization, I am in full accord with the rules which have been submitted, and I hope that every Member of this House who does believe in such liberalization and in complying with the wishes of the people of the country will vote for the rules as offered by the gentleman from North Carolina. [Applause.]

To the astute gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Michener, I desire to say that, regardless of his able efforts, he will not succeed in deceiving the country in the belief that he and his reactionary colleagues, who for years had it in their power to liberalize the rules, are now being deprived of any opportunity to express not only their views but also to vote upon the amendment, since he must and does know that his side, now the minority, has the right to vote down the previous question, and, although defeated in that, can move to recommit the resolution, and in that way give to him and to every Member of the House the right to vote twice on the subject matter before same can be adopted. Therefore no one is deprived or abridged in his rights under the Democratic majority, as was the case when his, the Republican Party, was in power.

The adoption of this rule, being the first legislative act of this new Congress, clearly demonstrates that the Democrats are ready and desirous not only that the majority should rule but also that the rights of the minority should be protected; and, above all, that we all stand ready and willing to carry out the wishes of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the rule recommended was adopted. It has served notably in at least two instances during the last Congress. It has had a salutary effect on committee actions which has not appeared in the actual record of happenings. It will be needed in the future, not only as a spur to effective work by the committees in charge of important legislation and to proper recognition by House leaders of demands of sizable minorities but also, perhaps, to rescue legislation.

If and when this proposed amendment of the rule is brought in, it should be fought as determinedly as we know how. This extension of remarks has been the only available way to present these facts to the House, and it is hoped that there will be ample opportunity to consider them maturely before Members are precipitated into ill-advised decisions, either in a party caucus or upon the floor.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, April 12, 1933, at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. My colleague the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is not with us this morning because of a great sadness which has come into his life. I wish this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. REED. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. DAVIS] is necessarily absent on account of illness.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

REPORT OF THE NEAR EAST RELIEF

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the executive secretary of the Near East Relief, submitting, pursuant to law, the report of the Near East Relief for the year ended December 31, 1932, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

FUNCTIONS OF THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND PARKS AND ALLIED COMMISSIONS (S.DOC. NO. 22)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital, reporting, pursuant to Senate Resolution 351, Seventy-second Congress, relative to the various functions, personnel, etc., of the Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital, the Public Buildings Commission, the Arlington Memorial Bridge Commission, and the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. KEAN presented a resolution adopted by the Most Worshipful Oriental Grand Lodge of Ancient Free and Accepted Masons in the State of New Jersey, favoring the passage of legislation making provision for the moral as well as the physical care of massed workers engaged in the governmental reforestation program, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. TYDINGS presented the petition of the Congress of Parents and Teachers, the Home and School Association, and the Education Association, all of the District of Columbia, praying for the restoration in the District of Columbia appropriation bill of items affecting services rendered by the public schools, libraries, and playgrounds so as to maintain educational and recreational facilities in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented the petition of members of the Middletown Lions Club, of Middletown, Md., praying for the prompt passage of the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power, which was ordered to lie on the table.

TARIFF ON IMPORTED FISH

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present and ask that there be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the body of a petition I have just received from fishermen of Dukes County, Mass., urging the enactment of a suitable and adequate tariff on imported fish.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Finance, and the body thereof was ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the attached signatures, as follows:

To the Honorable Senator DAVID I. WALSH:

The undersigned commercial fishermen of Dukes County respectfully petition for relief of the industry by the enactment of a suitable and adequate tariff on imported fish.

Imports of Canadian lobster and swordfish affect this locality in particular, the prevailing low prices paid for these commodities serving to reduce the income of domestic fishermen to a ruinous degree. For at least 2 years the Massachusetts fisheries, including those of Dukes County, have been losing ground in the fight against this manifestly unfair competition. Bankrupt fishermen, idle vessels, and failing local markets are the result. Another year like the last means even greater and more permanent ruin to this important industry.

Therefore, we request that as our Senator you act vigorously in the defense of the interests of your State and ours. That all proposed legislation relative to raising the tariff on imported fish receive your support. And that a sufficiently high tariff be insisted upon to equalize the prices of domestic and imported fish and seafoods.

It is our contention that the opening of Canadian ports to United States fishing vessels will not in any degree compensate New England fishermen for the losses involved in the marketing of their fish under present conditions, and we beg that you will not allow any consideration of this gesture by Canada to influence your attitude on the tariff question.

We are vessel and boat owners. Our communities depend upon the earnings of these crafts. We have elected you to office, confident that our interests would be entrusted to reliable hands. Do not betray that confidence.

PETITION OF WOMAN'S NATIONAL COMMITTEE FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I present a petition for redress of grievances presented by the Woman's National Committee for Law Enforcement, through Mrs. Henry W. Peabody, chairman, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PETITION TO GOVERNMENT FOR REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES

The first amendment to the Constitution provides for religious freedom, free speech, a free press, and "the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition the Government for redress of grievance."

Article VI of the Constitution declares "this Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof * * * shall be the supreme law of the land and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding."

1. The eighteenth amendment to the Constitution prohibits "the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes. The action of the Seventy-third Congress in passing a beer bill authorizing manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquor is, therefore, illegal under the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution.

2. No State has power to act against the supreme law according to article VI of the Constitution which declares "judges in every State shall be bound thereby." Any State allowing this beer bill to become law is in defiance of the Constitution of the United States.

3. Every Member of Congress and official of this Government is solemnly sworn to support and defend the Constitution "without mental reservation or purpose of evasion", which pledge was broken by those who voted for the unconstitutional bill.

4. Intoxicating liquor is defined as a "habit-making narcotic drug." One half of 1 percent was the standard adopted by Congress in 1920, since it was the standard of brewers in the contest over soft drinks. The British legal standard for alcoholic content is 1 percent (2 percent proof spirits). Any beverage containing more than 1 percent alcohol is declared intoxicating.

Two and seventy-five one-hundredths percent beer, on which tests have been made by the highest scientific authorities in America, is declared intoxicating by Dr. Haven Emerson, college physician and surgeon, Columbia University, New York; Prof. Walter Miles, of Yale University (test made with students of 18 years of age); Prof. E. D. McCollum, of Johns Hopkins; Dr. Benedict, of Carnegie Institute; Dr. Howard A. Kelly, Johns Hopkins; and others. Three and two-tenths percent beer, 4 percent by volume, is intoxicating, as it was the content of alcohol in beer sold and taxed before prohibition under license as intoxicating liquor.

5. "Who are the people?" Two thirds of the people of the United States are women and children who suffer most from this evil, and are disregarded and unrepresented by Congress. Alcohol leads to vice, crime, and disease. Beer takes from childhood food, clothing, fuel, and necessaries of life. This Government has no right to barter the welfare of the people for revenue. (Decision Supreme Court on Louisiana lottery.)

6. The bill offers no protection against saloons, which both party platforms pledged should not return; no provision against advertising an illegal product by press and radio; no law against locating saloons in close proximity to schools, churches, or homes or advertising in school cafeterias; no limit to the hours or days on which this liquor may be sold—Sundays are included.

7. The lack of coordination shown by scientific tests indicates grave danger on the highway through driving by men and women who have used 3.2-percent beer. Driving under the influence of liquor leads to murder and death. Have we no right to protection? Is not this Government liable for these murders?

If railroads, steamships, the Navy, and transportation agencies prohibit this beer as intoxicating in the interest of safety, we demand that this Government also provide such safeguards for communities and highways.

IN VIEW OF THESE GRIEVANCES

We call upon the people of the United States to demand that Congress revoke this illegal bill passed in collusion with brewers, organized agents, and capitalists opposed to the eighteenth amendment without regard to the safety and welfare of women and children in whose interest we, the Woman's National Committee for Law Enforcement, are entitled to speak. To secure protection of our rights and safety under the Constitution we present this petition to the President of the United States and both Houses of Congress, as we are authorized to do by the Constitution, and beg their attention and immediate action.

In memory of Washington and Jefferson, who wrote the Constitution, and Lincoln, who preserved it, we come to this memorial on this anniversary of the passing of the great President at the hands of an assassin who fortified himself with liquor at the old Tenth Street saloon before committing the crime. On this 14th day of April 1933 we pledge again our allegiance to the Constitution and the Union. It is the day of betrayal of our Lord through a referendum and the martyrdom of the man who saved the Union. Here in the presence of Almighty God we challenge the right of this Government to sanction the betrayal of the Nation by the return of the manufacture, sale, and transportation of "intoxicating liquor" forbidden by the Constitution.

WOMAN'S NATIONAL COMMITTEE FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT
(Representing 10 great national organizations of women affected by this illegal bill).

FRIDAY, APRIL 14, 1933.

THE WORLD COURT

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the printing in the RECORD of a resolution I have received from the Kiwanis Club of Irvington, N.J., urging the ratification of the World Court protocols, and that it may be appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution of the Irvington Kiwanis Club

Whereas since the First and Second Hague Conferences of 1899 and 1907 the United States has taken a leading part among the nations of the world in advocating the settlement of international disputes by judicial procedure; and

Whereas there came into existence in 1922 a World Court, established along the very lines advocated by American delegates in the two Hague Conferences; and

Whereas this Court has, in the 11 years of its existence, proved its practical value as an institution for peacefully settling international disputes by its successful settlement of 44 such disputes, many of which, had they been left unsettled, might have proved the cause of war; and

Whereas the United States Senate, by a vote of 76 to 17, in January 1928, declared that the United States should join the World Court if five conditions were met; and

Whereas in the view of the Department of State, the American Bar Association, and many other competent authorities these conditions are entirely met in the three World Court treaties now awaiting the Senate's action; and

Whereas these treaties have already been signed by the United States; and

Whereas in a world still suffering sharply from the tragic economic dislocations due primarily to the late war the clear endorsement by one of the greatest powers of the world of judicial settlement as one practicable substitute for war cannot fail to have a stabilizing effect; and

Whereas it seems to us a contradiction of sound legislative policy to allow a matter of such vital importance to remain unsettled for six years: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Irvington Kiwanis Club, That we do hereby declare our belief that the United States should speedily complete its adherence to the World Court by the Senate's ratification, at the earliest practicable moment in the special session, of the three World Court treaties now on the Senate's Executive Calendar; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent both the New Jersey Senators, with a request to Senator BARBOUR that he have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

CHECKING OF EROSION ON NEW JERSEY SHORES

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, also I ask unanimous consent for printing in the RECORD of a resolution I have received from the Board of Chosen Freeholders of Cape May County, N.J., urging that a portion of the unemployment relief funds be spent in checking erosion of the shore line of New Jersey, and ask that it may be appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOARD OF CHOSEN FREEHOLDERS,
Cape May County, N.J.

Resolution (by Mr. Miller)

Whereas it is understood that the United States Government is about to spend considerable amounts of money for reforestation and reclamation plans, particularly for the relieving of the unemployment situation; and

Whereas a continual and serious erosion of the shore line of New Jersey has created a condition that threatens the very existence of the seashore resorts, if this erosion is not checked; and

Whereas the conditions have become so serious and the cost of measures needed to check this erosion and protect this shore line is so great that in the present financial conditions the various municipalities are unable to furnish sufficient funds for the prosecution of such work: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the attention of President Roosevelt be called to this condition, and that he be, and hereby is, petitioned to give careful consideration to this condition, and direct the expenditure of a portion of the unemployment relief funds to the purposes above mentioned, and that copies of this resolution be sent to our Congressman and two United States Senators.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
County of Cape May, ss:

I, A. J. Cafiero, clerk of the Board of Chosen Freeholders of County of Cape May, State of New Jersey, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a correct and true copy of a resolution adopted by the board at a meeting duly held on the 5th day of April 1933.

A. J. CAFIERO,
Clerk of the Board.

INSURANCE CORPORATIONS AND THE LITTLE FELLOW

Mr. WALCOTT presented a newspaper editorial, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INSURANCE CORPORATIONS AND THE LITTLE FELLOW

In commenting on the plan for the refinancing of farm mortgages, Henry Morgenthau, Jr., Governor of the new Farm Credit Administration, said: "The little fellow—the farmer, the village banker, the forgotten man—will be taken care of first, the corporations afterwards." The corporations are the insurance companies, which hold about one third of the farm-mortgage indebtedness.

It is not necessary to quarrel with Mr. Morgenthau over this statement, but it does contain the taint of a superficial sort of public morality which gets a good deal of promotion these days. The insurance companies are heavily charged with the interests of the little fellow and, if we are still to remember him, of the forgotten man. There is probably no more vital interest in the country than the equities represented in these corporations. They contain the provision which men of small or moderate means have made against the future and for the security of their families. They contain the savings of a great mass of the indispensable part of the citizenship which seeks competence and guaranties in life by its own thrift and hard work.

A destruction of these equities and obligations and rights would be one of the hardest blows which hard times could hit the Nation. When the policyholders in a mass are referred to as a corporation, the intent seems to be, whether it is or not, to put them in a special category as to moral import. No such distinction can possibly be recognized.

It could even be said that these equities are of paramount importance over everything else when it comes to a question of obligation resting upon a custodial government. Both the farmer and the little man who went into debt and the village banker who extended the credit had something to do with the situation in which they find themselves. Their situation may be worthy of such aid as the Government can offer them, but that does not detract from the right of the policyholder to have his investment safeguarded in every way possible. Social philosophy is entirely too much disposed to dismiss the corporation as a thing without wide-spread human elements.

TENNESSEE VALLEY DEVELOPMENT—MUSCLE SHOALS PROJECT

Mr. NORRIS. From the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I ask unanimous consent to report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 1272) to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals, in the State of Alabama; and for other purposes, and to submit a unanimous report (No. 23) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be received and placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. TYDINGS:

A bill (S. 1291) for the relief of the E. J. Codd Co. of Baltimore City, Inc.; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 1292) to provide medical services after retirement on annuity to former employees of the United States disabled by injuries sustained in the performance of their duties; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 1293) authorizing the President to order Maj. E. P. Duval before a retiring board for a hearing of his case, and upon the findings of such board determine whether or not he be placed on the retired list with the rank and pay held by him at the time of his resignation; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 1294) to provide for separate patents in case of any invention constructed in types or forms suitable for different uses; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. NORBECK:

A bill (S. 1298) for the relief of the Sioux Valley Hospital, Sioux Falls Clinic, and the McKenna Hospital, all of Sioux Falls, S.Dak.; and

A bill (S. 1299) for the relief of Mrs. Glenn J. Collier; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 1300) to provide for the payment of Sioux benefits to certain women of the Sioux Tribe of Indians; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 1301) to prohibit the transportation in the mails, or in interstate commerce, of machine guns or submachine guns; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 1302) for the relief of Frank Fisher (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 1303) to provide for the acquisition of Chappawamsic Island, Va., for the use of the Navy Department; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 1304) granting a pension to Ben C. Ash (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 1305) granting a pension to Charles H. Carpenter (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 1306) granting a pension to David Dorian (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 1307) granting a pension to Mary J. Driscoll (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 1308) granting a pension to Charlie Kills-in-Sight or Kills In;

A bill (S. 1309) granting a pension to Walter L. Vercoe (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 1310) granting a pension to Augustine Whitebird (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 1311) granting an increase of pension to Mitchell Desersa (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 1312) granting an increase of pension to John A. Everett (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 1313) granting an increase of pension to Hugh M. Jones (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NEELY:

A bill (S. 1314) for the relief of Perry Randolph; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 1315) granting an increase of pension to Mary C. Caplinger; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GEORGE:

A bill (S. 1316) to provide for the collection and publication of statistics of peanuts by the Department of Agriculture; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. BARBOUR, the Committee on the District of Columbia was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1066) relating to contracts for the erection or alteration of public buildings, and it was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

BENEFITS TO THE WHALING INDUSTRY—AMENDMENT

Mr. MCNARY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 15) extending to the whaling industry certain benefits granted under section 11 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE—AMENDMENTS

Mr. BARBOUR, Mr. FRAZIER, Mr. MCGILL, and Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma each submitted an amendment, Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas submitted 2 amendments, and Mr. CLARK submitted 5 amendments, intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power, which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD submitted four amendments intended to be proposed by him to the amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. WAGNER to title II, Agricultural Credits, of House bill 3835, the agricultural relief bill, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States, submitting several nominations, were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE—NOTICE OF RECONSIDERATION OF AN AMENDMENT

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, yesterday the Senate, without any consideration, agreed to the amendment on page 22 of the so-called "agricultural relief bill". I was not on the floor at the time. I have had a sheaf of telegrams relating to it, and I desire to have it recorded that I shall move, at a later time, to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment, on page 22, from lines 14 to 19, inclusive, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice of the Senator from New York will be entered.

FEDERAL ACCOUNTING, PURCHASING, AND DISBURSING SYSTEMS

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I desire to make a unanimous-consent request with reference to two resolutions which I submitted, and which were adopted during the last session of the Congress. I think the request will lead to no debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, late in the closing session of the last Congress, on February 8, 1933, there was adopted by the Senate, at my suggestion and with a view to securing facts necessary to an intelligent and safe reorganization of certain activities, Senate Resolution No. 350, requesting the Comptroller General to report to the Senate on or before April 15, 1933, the savings that might be secured through reorganization, centralization, consolidation, and/or elimination of accounting records, accounting and audit procedures, disbursing and collecting offices, and purchasing and warehousing activities of the Governments of the United States and the District of Columbia.

On the same day the Senate adopted, at my suggestion, Senate Resolution No. 351, calling upon the heads of all departments, independent establishments, and Government-owned and/or controlled corporations to submit to the President and to the Senate on or before April 15, 1933, a detailed report of all functions, including accounting, disbursing, collecting, purchasing, and personnel performed by said department, establishment, and corporations, together with the authority for the performance of each function and the annual cost thereof.

It now appearing that much of the information to be furnished by the heads of departments, establishments, and corporations pursuant to Senate Resolution No. 351 should be taken into consideration by the Comptroller General in reporting to the Senate pursuant to its Resolution No. 350 in order that this may be made possible, I ask the consent of the Senate that the date for reporting under Senate Resolution No. 350 be extended to May 6, 1933.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I did not understand the nature of the request.

Mr. WHEELER. I have asked unanimous consent that the time for the Comptroller to report to the Senate may be extended from April 15 to May 6.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WHEELER. I likewise ask that the time in which the various departments may report under Senate Resolution 351 shall be extended to May 1 in order to give them time to get their reports ready.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, considering the disposition of business yesterday, I inquire what is the order of business this morning?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment on page 25, commencing in line 7.

Mr. LEWIS. The amendment is to the pending bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is to the pending bill.

Mr. LEWIS. Has the motion to reconsider the action in passing the bill known as the "30 hour bill", the bill of the honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], been noted for this morning?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No. The Senate took a recess last night, and therefore the pending business before the Senate is the agricultural relief bill.

Mr. LEWIS. And the pending amendment is to that bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Chair.

6-HOUR DAY AND 5-DAY WEEK—MOTION TO RECONSIDER

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana obtained the floor.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me in order that I may ask for a unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator if his request will lead to no discussion. I may say that I myself do not expect to consume more than from 15 to 20 minutes' time.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to ask unanimous consent that the pending business may be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senate may consider the motion to reconsider the vote whereby the so-called "30 hour bill" was passed. I have sought diligently to ascertain how many Senators wanted to speak on the motion. I have not been able to ascertain that many want to speak on it. There is certainly no reason why it should be held up. We had plenty of time to discuss the measure when it was before the Senate. The Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], who made the motion to reconsider, is perfectly willing to proceed with it and desires to talk about 20 minutes. I desire to ask unanimous consent that the pending bill may be temporarily laid aside in order that the motion to reconsider may be taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the pending business may be laid aside for the purpose of considering the motion of the Senator from Florida to reconsider the vote whereby the so-called "30-hour bill" was passed.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, yesterday, when this proposal was made, I objected to it because a time was set for its consideration in the way of an expression by vote. Today the proposal conforms to the usual parliamentary practice of temporarily setting aside the unfinished business in order to proceed to the consideration of the motion, under which proceeding any Member of the Senate may call for the regular order at any time. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] first offered the amendment which the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] now desires to reoffer. The Senator from West Virginia is intensely interested in this proposition, and, in his absence, I shall have to object.

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator will yield for a statement, I desire to state to the Senator that on yesterday when the Senator from West Virginia objected, I went over to his desk and asked him if he desired to make a speech or if his objection was personal to himself or was made for some other Senator. I stated then on the floor that I had been informed by the Senator from West Virginia that he was objecting for the Senator from Maine, and that he personally would not make the objection. Therefore I asked for a quorum.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia spoke to me during the day and stated that, in his opinion, several Senators representing border States wanted to be heard on this matter. The Senator from West Virginia is absent from the Chamber; I have sent for him; but, during his absence, I shall have to ask the Senator to withhold his request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

THE QUESTION OF RUSSIAN RECOGNITION

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, conditions prevail in the United States today which are unparalleled in the history of the Republic. Misery, want, suffering, and even starvation stalk throughout the length and breadth of the land. With the possible exception of China and India, I doubt whether economic conditions are worse at this moment in any other country on the face of the globe.

The American people are confronted with problems crying for solution which are positively staggering in their scope.

To the domestic issues that confront us, accordingly, the Government is giving its most earnest consideration.

In the midst of this momentous situation, the demand for immediate recognition of the Russian Government intrudes, and advocates of such a policy are insistent on their demands that it be given immediate attention, notwithstanding the fact that any cursory analysis of the situation is bound to reveal the fact that the Russian question is utterly remote and extraneous to solution of the problems which confront us.

Everybody knows that in normal times not more than 7 percent of our production is sold abroad, and a comparatively small part even of this 7 percent is sold to Russia. How any unprejudiced mind, therefore, could conceive that recognition of the Soviet Republics would in the slightest degree remedy our economic situation here is difficult, if not impossible, to understand. But propaganda is afloat on all sides, perhaps never more insistent than now, urging that we should go into immediate partnership with the Soviets at a moment when the most momentous problems that ever have confronted the American people cry out for the best thought and the promptest action the Government can provide.

Because of the renewed efforts to revive the Russian question at this perilous moment in our history, I deem it, therefore, advisable in the midst of consideration of the pending measure to take the time of the Senate to discuss this question.

The entire policy of the present Russian Government is subversive to the rest of the world. The Soviets have no regard for solemn treaties, frankly avowing that they will sign any pact that will further their interests with the unconcealed intention to violate it as soon as self-interest has been served.

Menjinsky, head of the OGPU., or secret police of Russia, and a power in the councils of the Soviet Government, and the Third International, which are precisely the same, made this deliberate statement:

> As long as there are idiots to take our signature seriously, and to put their trust in it, we must promise everything that is being asked, and as much as one likes, if we can only get something tangible in exchange.

On February 2, 1919, on the Princes Island proposal, Zinoviev, a power in Soviet councils, also said:

> We are willing to sign an unfavorable peace with the Allies. It would only mean that we should put no trust whatever in the piece of paper we should sign. We should use the breathing space so obtained to gather our strength in order that the mere continued existence of our Government would keep up the world-wide propaganda which Soviet Russia has been carrying on for more than a year.

Trotsky, now in exile, but in 1918 one of the Moscow masters—and the present rulers of Russia continue to follow the same policy—made the statement that—

> If in waiting the imminent proletarian flood in Europe, Russia should be compelled to conclude peace with the present-day governments of the central powers, it would be provisional, temporary, and transitory peace, with the revision of which the European revolution will have to concern itself in the first instance. Our whole policy is built upon the expectation of this revolution.

The child is father to the man and the Moscow Government is the father to the Third International. No one disputes that fact. It is admitted by the Moscow masters themselves, and the entire purpose of the Third Internationale is to destroy in any manner possible all other governments of the earth.

Great Britain recognized the Soviet Government and shortly afterward discovered in London the same sort of Soviet plottings that China unearthed in Harbin. Consequently, it became necessary to break off diplomatic relations.

Subsequently, another effort was made to get along with them and because of the high-handed disregard for international law which the Communistic Government displayed recently with reference to British subjects, the Ambassador of Great Britain to that country was recalled, and within the past 10 days the House of Commons, by a vote of 347 to 48, determined to impose an embargo on all Russian trade in reprisal for the arrest of British engineers in Russia. In other words, Great Britain found that trade with Russia was a positive handicap rather than an advantage.

France was forced to demand the recall of the Soviet Ambassador from Paris. Mexico and practically every other nation has had similar unhappy experiences with that benighted land.

It is a matter of common knowledge that Germany and Japan, as well as the United States, have been forced to deport communist conspirators acting in the name of organized tyranny that holds 150,000,000 Russians in virtual slavery today.

It is estimated that the total number of members of the Communist Party in that land is not to exceed 500,000, and in the most tyrannical fashion they wield the lash over the other 150,000,000.

In the face of these facts, it is passing strange that anyone in America should urge official recognition of that system.

At the present time, representatives of the Moscow masters are busily engaged all over this country in creating dissension and dissatisfaction among our people. They are violently opposed to our philosophy, and day and night are working industriously to overthrow our Government.

That is the situation under present conditions. What would it be if they were officially recognized? What would recognition mean?

Well, in the first place they would have an elaborate embassy located in Washington, fully staffed, entitled to many immunities, and this machinery would unquestionably be used as the central point for carrying on their admitted efforts to destroy the American Republic.

In the Soviet Embassy here, the seditious concoction would be brewed and from this embassy would emanate to all points of the United States the vicious propaganda calculated to poison American public opinion against our own institutions.

Dangerous as their activities are to our peace and welfare under present conditions, they would be infinitely worse if conducted under the official cloak of American recognition. That has been the experience of other lands. In other words, we would be simply placing a gun in their hands with which to shoot us.

I refuse to go into official partnership with any such concern, and I am not a little surprised that it would be seriously proposed. The fact is indisputable, that the Soviets have undertaken to abolish both religion and the family. Here again we may safely rely on the language of their own leaders.

So far as Russia is concerned, Lenin is the founder of the system, and since his death has been deified by the Communists and is worshiped practically as a god.

In 1923, speaking before the Department of Education in Russia, Lenin said:

> Give us the child for 8 years and it will be a Bolshevist forever. We have struck the kings from the earth * * * now let us strike the King from the skies.

He was referring, of course, to Almighty God.

> We must hate—hatred is the basis of communism. Children must be taught to hate their parents if they are not Communists. If they are, then the child need not respect them; need no longer worry about them.

These are not the words of antirecognition propagandists against bolshevism—they are the words of Lenin himself, the founder of the philosophy, or, in any event, the man who put it into practice on the largest scale the world has ever known.

Again, Lunacharsky said, at Moscow:

> We hate Christianity and Christians; even the best of them must be regarded as our worst enemies. They preach love of one's neighbor and mercy, which is contrary to our principles.
>
> Christian love is an obstacle to the development of the revolution. Down with the love of one's neighbors. What we need is hatred. We must know how to hate; only thus shall we conquer the universe.

Another quotation from Lenin:

> Religion must be abolished. The best country is a godless country. If religion will pass out quietly, our attitude will be one of benevolent tolerance. But if it resists we will hasten its exit by violence proportioned to its resistance.

Religious persecution is the order of the day there, nor is any religion immune. All are proscribed, and the effort to dignify atheism as a national religion for the Russian people is unconcealed.

The family as an institution has all but disappeared. Children are separated from parents; wives are separated from husbands; marriage is debauched and divorce is worse than a travesty.

They have undertaken to abolish God and have destroyed the family, and over these accomplishments the Moscow masters gloat with satisfaction and glee.

These two institutions, religion and the family, held sacred by Americans everywhere, have been trodden under foot and practically abolished.

Mr. President, who would wish to have the American people go into partnership, through the channels of diplomatic relations, with a system like that?

Free labor has been practically annihilated over there. In January 1931 an official ukase of the Soviet Government of Russia conscripted all labor needed in the railroad service. All departments, enterprises, and administrations were ordered to report the names of all persons having railway experience within 10 days, and to dismiss such employees with 2 weeks' pay and orders to report to the Soviet Railway Administration. Criminal proceedings, it was announced, would be taken against persons who tried to evade such service, and employers who assisted in such concealment. The entire mobilization had to be finished by March 1. This order is printed in the Soviet official press. Yet the Soviet authorities and their mouthpieces in the United States who persistently attempt to conceal the true character of the Moscow despotism by impudent lying will continue to deny that labor is conscripted in Soviet Russia.

Walter Duranty, formerly the Moscow correspondent of the London Times, now associated with the New York Times, sent a dispatch, subject to Sovnet censorship, to his publication, which placed the number of exiles at work in Russian concentration camps at 1,000,000, 200,000 of whom were in the northern timber camps. And he stated further that in addition to exiles in concentration camps, many others were forbidden to live in cities or other specified localities. In fact, the total number of people sentenced to some form of exile during the 2-year period was placed by him at 2,000,000. And according to the Soviet official press itself, political executions were recorded for the 2 months of October and November as follows:

Kulaks (property-owning peasants)	147
Enemies of the Soviet Government	39
Religious activity	32
Specialists and sabotageurs	25
Contrabandists and spies	3
Total	246

It is no wonder American labor opposes most vigorously any official recognition being extended by our Government.

Alvin E. Johnson, formerly Geneva correspondent of the New York World, I am informed, Mr. President, has conducted an exhaustive official inquiry which proves that the Soviet dictators are carrying forward an ambitious plan for world-wide dumping as a means of economic disturbance leading to revolution in non-Communist nations. I read from his statement:

> This is being pushed forward through constantly increasing enslavement of the workers and farmers, with wholesale conscription of labor, and unbelievable conditions prevailing in the timber camps and fisheries of eastern Russia. Here many scores of wretched men, half starving, are held in slavery and driven to their tasks insufficiently fed and clothed.

I read further from his statement:

> Wholesale seizures of people have been made on trumped-up charges, and they have been condemned to a living death as slaves of the dictatorship, because of inability to get free labor to submit to iron discipline imposed by the Moscow masters. The aristocrats, bourgeoisie, and kulaks, numbering millions, are disappearing from the face of Russia; where they have gone is a mystery, but it is apparent that most of them have been exterminated. The officials of the economic section call attention to the fact that enlightened statesmen in non-Communist countries have become aroused to the reality of the menace involved in the enslavement of millions of people to a ruthless political and industrial machine, inspired by hatred for the rest of the world, and moved by a fanatical purpose to destroy all non-Communist nations.

Some time ago Matthew Woll, vice president of the American Federation of Labor, summed it up in a brief statement which I am glad to quote:

ENSLAVE LABOR IN SOVIET RUSSIA

> America's wage earners are not frightened by the bombast of Soviet 5-year plan. But we are concerned at the enslavement as political convicts of countless thousands of Russian and Finnish peasants whose only offense is, that after a lifetime of hard labor, they have shown enough efficiency to own half a dozen cattle. These are the people that are being forced to cutting down the timber, mining the coal, and producing the materials being shipped into and dumped upon our market now.

The method by which these innocent and hard-working agriculturalists are converted into convicts is very simple.

A decree forbidding all retail merchants to sell any goods in any part of the country to any individual not possessed of a collective card has been issued by the Soviet Government. But those cards are delivered only to farmers who have consented to abandon their lands and stocks of grain to the community.

Some farmers have tried, and try yet, to resist the compulsion and to live on the products of their farms. Then the "shock brigade" intervenes.

The stubborn village is surrounded by armed bands; the peasants are seized under the threat of guns; they are tied up, stripped, horsewhipped; 1 out of 10, if no more, is shot; the rest are deported to remote provinces and never heard of any more.

This process of enslavement of the peasants is being systematically and openly extended to Russia's entire agricultural population.

The system of state slavery applied to the industrial workers necessarily takes a somewhat different form.

On October 11, last, Soviet Russia issued a decree abolishing all relief whatever for their unemployed and forced them not only to work under orders or starve but to work under orders or be blacklisted by the Soviets who have a monopoly of employment. Here are the exact words of this newest law. I quote from the New York Times dispatch of Duranty, the most ardent and reliable of prosoviet correspondents.

"Unemployed persons must accept work, not only in accordance with their own specialty but also, if necessary, work requiring no special qualification.

"No reason for refusal of such proposed work will be accepted except illness supported by a medical certificate. Refusal to accept work will involve removal of such persons' names from labor-exchange files."

In other words, the unemployed must accept the work offered by the Government on its own terms or be officially blacklisted.

As the Soviet is the sole employer and does not permit its victims to leave the country, this new Soviet law can only mean that all Soviet labor has become forced labor, as defined by our law.

Again on January 30, 1933, William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, had the following to say:

In order that there be no confused state of the public mind with reference to the position of the American Federation of Labor upon this question, it seems appropriate to restate, in positive terms, the uncompromising opposition of the American Federation of Labor to the recognition of the Soviet Government by the United States Government. * * * Labor will not compromise upon this principle. It originally declared its opposition to the recognition of the Soviet Government until the Soviet Government ceased its Communist activities in our own land and until it disavowed its declared purpose, made through the Third International, to promote world revolution and to force the acceptance of the Communist philosophy through force.

Mr. Green understands perfectly well that if we trade with Russia we must buy their goods.

That would mean—

Says Mr. Green—

that labor in the United States would suffer through the importation of goods produced and manufactured by Russian labor under intolerable conditions of employment and at an indefensible low rate of wages.

To support his contention, Mr. Green points out the example of demoralizing trade with Russia through shipments of anthracite coal to America selling for less money in New England and on the eastern seaboard than our own Pennsylvania miners can produce it.

In a folder issued by the American Federation of Labor, this statement appears:

Trade-unionism and communism are as opposite as the poles. The claim that the two movements have the same purpose but differ as to methods is the statement of a trickster and an ignoramus. Organized workers are not interested in the next century. They would improve the world in their time and depend upon future generations to do likewise. That is why they struggle for higher wages, shorter hours, sanitary shops, compensation for injury, death, and occupational diseases, etc. The object of the simon-pure Communist is revolution—not only industrial but an upheaval of morals, ethics, and every other right relation between men.

But notwithstanding all known facts to the contrary, some Americans insist on contending that recognition would be a good thing for us economically.

Well, in the first place, trade has been going on with Russia on quite a large scale for a number of years and it has brought no noticeable economic benefit to us. The truth is, when we do trade with that country, Russia demands cash from us on our purchases and long-time credit on what she buys. This, notwithstanding the fact that on former occasions she has deliberately repudiated her financial obligations to our people; and the present Soviet Government insists that a treaty is only a "scrap of paper", to be violated whenever her own self-interest suggests such action.

According to an Associated Press dispatch published in the Washington Star, Italy will call a halt on trade with the Soviets after 2 years. Her experiences with that country have been unhappy. Italy paid in cash, while Russia paid in credits running from 9 to 52 months.

Russia got the lion's share of the trading and thereby chalked up a balance heavily unfavorable to Italy.

The dispatch adds—

Russia got the lion's share of the trading and Italy is left holding the bag with a half billion lire in promissory notes.

Other countries have had similar experiences.

The truth is Russia owes every nation with whom she has dealt. Italy, England, France, Germany, the United States—all tell the same story.

And even granting for the sake of argument, though I do not admit its truth, that trade relations might be stimulated, how would we be advantaged if we pay out cash to them and extend credit for their purchases here? That they expect such an arrangement is admitted by their own leader.

For instance, John G. Ohsol, vice president of Amtorg, New York City, official Soviet agents, said on December 18, 1932:

Most of this business will go to other countries which have extended more favorable credit conditions and have not placed restrictions on Russian goods.

Peter A. Bogdanov, chairman of Amtorg, New York City, official Soviet agents, on May 26, 1932, had this to say:

The United States must buy as well as sell if it wants to enjoy a profitable business with Soviet Russia. It is obvious that the trade cannot be a one-sided affair.

And July 23, 1932, from the same source:

If America wishes to enjoy a profitable trade with Soviet Russia, she must arrange a liberal credit through which such business can be carried on.

In other words, Russia is willing to buy provided she is extended long-time credits and receives payment from us in cash.

When it is considered that she is only one of the many countries of the globe buying from us, and that our entire export is normally less than 7 percent of our production, it becomes perfectly apparent that no possible economic advantage can be gained by official recognition.

Of course, as I see it, recognition of the Soviet Government would be unwise from any standpoint; but its avowed purpose to destroy organized government everywhere, it seems to me, makes recognition unthinkable.

The Daily Worker, published in New York City, is the official organ in this country of the Communists. I quote from the issue of September 18, 1918, with reference to the growth of the Communist movement:

* * * American defenders of Soviet Russia attempt to differentiate in their public utterances between the Third International and the Soviet Government in their false claim that revolutionary agitation in the United States is not under the direction of the Soviet Government. The central editorial in the Daily Worker, official Russian Communist organ in the United States, is by Joseph Stalin, head of the Soviet Government and of the Third International. Stalin directs American Communists to read two books—Building Socialism in the Soviet Union, which presents working plans whereby the Communists in the United States may lay the groundwork for the Communist revolution here; second, The Trade Unions of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, suggesting ways in which the working trades of the United States may be subverted to Communist revolutionary purposes. It is fair to say that those who pretend there is a distinction between the Moscow Government and the Third Internationale know better. It is not ignorance but cunning which causes them to take this position.

The following paragraph is from the report of Comrade Kussinen at the tenth plenum of the executive committee of the Comintern, governing body of the Communists of the world, as printed in the Daily Worker:

> The world army of the active class fighters is growing at a tremendously rapid pace. The miners in the Ruhr and in Scotland, the textile workers in Poland and in France, the barricade fighters of Berlin, the Bombay strikers and demonstrators, the plantation strikers in Colombia, the rebellious negroes in the Congo, the striking agricultural laborers in Czechoslovakia and in Poland, the revolutionary trade unions and the peasant guerilla warriors in China, the rebellious tribes in Morocco, and hundreds of thousands of other fighting groups—this is a gigantic active army. It shows how the revolutionary movement is growing throughout the world. If it goes on at this rate, all will be well. Yet the Communist Internationale should and will bring together even greater masses of the millions for the fight against the world bourgeoisie and for the proletarian world revolution.

The above shows the movement to be world-wide in scope, and, at the same time, admits that the Moscow Government and the Third Internationale are one the same thing.

Citing the particular tasks of the Communist Party, the thesis of the twelfth plenum of the Communist Internationale at Moscow, November 1932, among other things, contains the following:

> The American party must mobilize the masses and concentrate chiefly for social insurance, etc., etc. * * * In regard to organization, carefully conceal the communistic nuclei in the factories, immediately proceed to form strictly secret nuclei in the military units and the militarized organization of the bourgeoisie in munition factories, on the railroads and in the ports and to take measures to insure that the party can promptly pass to an illegal basis in case of necessity.

And at the same time, Joseph Stalin, dictator of Russia and head of the Communist Party, made the following statement:

> I consider that the Communist Party in the U.S.A. is one of the few communist parties to which history has confided decisive tasks from the viewpoint of the world revolutionary movement. The revolutionary crisis has not yet arrived in the United States, but there are already numerous indications which lead us to believe that it is near.
>
> The Third International has enabled the Communist Party of America to reach a stage where it can actively prepare the masses for future revolution.
> American capitalism is thus moving relentlessly, not toward a technical or an industrial revolution, but toward a proletarian revolution.

Finally, I desire to quote to some extent from an article by Donald Day, published in the Chicago Daily Tribune of March 28, this year, with reference to Russian boasts of undermining world stability.

> The report opens by stating that events of the last 2 years have confirmed Stalin's thesis that capitalism, after having passed through an era of temporary stabilization, is ripe for more active revolutionary leadership from Moscow, and claims that Stalin's program to develop world revolution through cultivating strikes has been successful.
> Communists abroad, continues the report, have begun for the first time actively to organize the farmers of the United States, Germany, France, Holland, Spain, and Czechoslovakia with large success. * * * According to statistics of the comintern headquarters its agents abroad now number 1,276,690, an increase of one third since June 1932.

In summarizing the revolutionary activities in different parts of the world from the official report we see from Mr. Day's story the following:

Japan: Influential on students, workers, peasants, and soldiers. Much illegal literature is being distributed.

China: Party has grown from 192,000 to 280,000 in last 18 months; has supported boycott against Japan and is helping Chinese Red Army.

Spain: Few hundred Communists when Spanish Republic was declared; now has 17,500 and controls unions with membership of 200,000.

Poland: White Russians and Ukrainian branches cooperating with Communists to overthrow present regime.

Czechoslovakia: Growth in membership from 22,000 to 75,000.

Italy: Parading as Fascists, the Communists have organized strikes and uprisings.

England: Active part in textile strike and other industrial activities.

In short, Mr. President, I am unable to find one good reason for Russian recognition. On the contrary, all the evidence points in the other direction.

Up to this hour we have steadfastly turned our faces against recognition. Most of us have come to believe that attitude to be our settled policy. It was formulated in the latter part of Woodrow Wilson's administration. On August 10, 1920, the Secretary of State, Bainbridge Colby, stated this policy in a note to the Italian Ambassador. Mr. Colby said:

> In the view of this Government there cannot be any common ground upon which it can stand with a power whose conceptions of international relations are so entirely alien to our own, so utterly repugnant to its moral sense. There can be no mutual confidence or trust, no respect even, if pledges are to be given and agreements made with a cynical repudiation of their obligations already in the minds of one of the parties. We cannot recognize, hold official relations with, or give friendly reception to the agents of a government which is determined and bound to conspire against our institutions; whose diplomats will be agitators of dangerous revolt; whose spokesmen say that they sign agreements with no intention of keeping them.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Would the Senator be so kind as to print at the conclusion of his remarks the letter or pronouncement of Mr. Colby, made when he was Secretary of State, to which the Senator has referred?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I shall be very happy to do so.

From that day to this the policy then enunciated has been followed by succeeding administrations.

Answering recognitionists, Charles Evans Hughes, when he was head of the State Department, spoke as follows:

> The American Government, as the President said in his message to Congress, is not proposing to barter away its principles. If the Soviet authorities are ready to restore confiscated property of American citizens or make effective compensation, they can do so. If the Soviet authorities are ready to repeal their decree repudiating Russia's obligations to this country and appropriately recognize them, they can do so * * *. Most serious is the continued propaganda to overthrow the institutions of this country. This Government can enter into no negotiations until these efforts directed from Moscow are abandoned.

In a message to Congress, President Calvin Coolidge said:

> I do not propose to barter away for the privilege of trade any of the cherished rights of humanity. I do not propose to make merchandise of any American principles. These rights and principles must go wherever the sanctions of our Government go.

Herbert Hoover adopted the same policy throughout his administration.

Now, in the course of events, Franklin D. Roosevelt is the Chief Executive of the Nation, and from all sides the propagandists are urging a change in this sound American policy.

Indeed, broad intimations are heard to the effect that President Roosevelt is not unfriendly to the proposed change.

It is fervently to be hoped that the rumors are not well founded. In the midst of all our troubles it is the devout wish of the American people that executive concentration be directed to the solution of our domestic difficulties.

But regardless of what may be in the Presidential mind, I shall personally, with whatever humble ability I may possess, do everything in my power to prevent Russian recognition.

I refuse to lend my sanction to a partnership with a group of conspirators who openly avow that one of their chief objectives is the destruction of the Government under which I live, and to which I owe my allegiance.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, immediately following my address on this subject, the document alluded to by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], namely, the statement of Mr. Bainbridge Colby, in full.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF AMERICAN NOTE REFUSING TO RECOGNIZE SOVIET RUSSIA

NOTE OF SECRETARY OF STATE COLBY TO THE ITALIAN AMBASSADOR, AUGUST 10, 1920

(Department of State notes exchanged on the Russian-Polish situation by the United States, France, and Poland, International Conciliation Pamphlets, October 1920, no. 155, pp. 5–11)

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 10, 1920.

EXCELLENCY: The agreeable intimation which you have conveyed to the State Department, that the Italian Government would welcome a statement of the views of this Government on the situation presented by the Russian advance into Poland, deserves a prompt response, and I will attempt without delay a definition of this Government's position not only as to the situation arising from Russian military pressure upon Poland but also as to certain cognate and inseparable phases of the Russian question viewed more broadly.

This Government believes in a united, free, and autonomous Polish State, and the people of the United States are earnestly solicitous for the maintenance of Poland's political independence and territorial integrity. From this attitude we will not depart, and the policy of this Government will be directed to the employment of all available means to render it effectual.

The Government, therefore, takes no exception to the effort apparently being made in some quarters to arrange an armistice between Poland and Russia, but it would not, at least for the present, participate in any plan for the expansion of the armistice negotiations into a general European conference, which would in all probability involve two results, from both of which this country strongly recoils, viz, the recognition of the Bolshevist regime and a settlement of the Russian problem almost inevitably upon the basis of a dismemberment of Russia.

From the beginning of the Russian revolution, in March 1917, to the present moment the Government and the people of the United States have followed its development with friendly solicitude and with profound sympathy for the efforts of the Russian people to reconstruct their national life upon the broad basis of popular self-government. The Government of the United States, reflecting the spirit of its people, has at all times desired to help the Russian people. In that spirit all its relations with Russia and with other nations in matters affecting the latter's interests have been conceived and governed.

The Government of the United States was the first Government to acknowledge the validity of the revolution and to give recognition of the provisional government of Russia. Almost immediately thereafter it became necessary for the United States to enter the war against Germany, and in that undertaking to become closely associated with the allied nations, including, of course, Russia. The war weariness of the masses of the Russian people was fully known to this Government and sympathetically comprehended. Prudence, self-interest, and loyalty to our associates made it desirable that we should give moral and material support to the provisional government, which was struggling to accomplish a twofold task—to carry on the war with vigor and, at the same time, to reorganize the life of the nation and establish a stable government based on popular sovereignty.

Quite independent of these motives, however, was the sincere friendship of the Government and the people of the United States for the great Russian nation. The friendship manifested by Russia toward this Nation in a time of trial and distress has left with us an imperishable sense of gratitude. It was as a grateful friend that we sent to Russia an expert commission to aid in bringing about such a reorganization of the railroad transportation system of the country as would reinvigorate the whole of its economic life and so add to the well-being of the Russian people.

While deeply regretting the withdrawal of Russia from the war at a critical time, and the disastrous surrender at Brest-Litovsk, the United States has fully understood that the people of Russia were in nowise responsible.

The United States maintains unimpaired its faith in the Russian people, in their high character, and their future. That they will overcome the existing anarchy, suffering, and destitution we do not entertain the slightest doubt. The distressing character of Russia's transition has many historical parallels, and the United States is confident that restored, free, and united Russia will again take a leading place in the world, joining with the other free nations in upholding peace and orderly justice.

Until that time shall arrive the United States feels that friendship and honor require that Russia's interests must be generously protected, and that, as far as possible, all decisions of vital importance to it, and especially those concerning its sovereignty over the territory of the former Russian Empire, be held in abeyance. By this feeling of friendship and honorable obligation to the great nation whose brave and heroic self-sacrifice contributed so much to the successful termination of the war, the Government of the United States was guided in its reply to the Lithuanian National Council, on October 15, 1919, and in its persistent refusal to recognize the Baltic States as separate nations independent of Russia. The same spirit was manifested in the note of this Government of March 24, 1920, in which it was stated, with reference to certain proposed settlements in the Near East, that no final decision should or can be made without the consent of Russia.

In line with these important declarations of policy the United States withheld its approval from the decision of the Supreme Council at Paris recognizing the independence of the so-called Republics of Georgia and Azerbaijan, and so instructed its representative in southern Russia, Rear Admiral Newton A. McCully.

Finally, while gladly giving recognition to the independence of Armenia, the Government of the United States has taken the position that final determination of its boundaries must not be made without Russia's cooperation and agreement. Not only is Russia concerned because a considerable part of the territory of the new State of Armenia, when it shall be defined, formerly belonged to the Russian Empire, equally important is the fact that Armenia must have the good will and protective friendship of Russia if it is to remain independent and free.

These illustrations show with what consistency the Government of the United States has been guided in its foreign policy by a loyal friendship for Russia. We are unwilling that while it is helpless in the grip of a nonrepresentative government, whose only sanction is brutal force, Russia shall be weakened still further by a policy of dismemberment conceived in other than Russian interests.

With the desire of the Allied Powers to bring about a peaceful solution of the existing difficulties in Europe this Government is, of course, in hearty accord, and will support any justifiable steps to that end. It is unable to perceive, however, that a recognition of the Soviet regime would promote, much less accomplish, this object, and it is therefore adverse to any dealings with the Soviet regime beyond the most narrow boundaries to which a discussion of an armistice can be confined.

That the present rulers of Russia do not rule by the will or the consent of any considerable proportion of the Russian people is an incontestable fact. Although nearly 2½ years have passed since they seized the machinery of government, promising to protect the Constituent Assembly against alleged conspiracies against it, they have not yet permitted anything in the way of a popular election. At the moment when the work of creating a popular representative government based upon universal suffrage was nearing completion the Bolsheviki, although in number an inconsiderable minority of the people, by force and cunning seized the powers and machinery of government, and have continued to use them with savage oppression to maintain themselves in power.

Without any desire to interfere in the internal affairs of the Russian people or to suggest what kind of government they should have, the Government of the United States does express the hope that they will soon find a way to set up a government representing their free will and purpose. When that time comes the United States will consider the measures of practical assistance which can be taken to promote the restoration of Russia, provided Russia has not taken itself wholly out of the pale of the friendly interest of other nations by the pillage and oppression of the Poles.

It is not possible for the Government of the United States to recognize the present rulers of Russia as a government with which the relations common to friendly governments can be maintained. This conviction has nothing to do with any particular political or social structure which the Russian people themselves may see fit to embrace. It rests upon a wholly different set of facts. These facts, which none disputes, have convinced the Government of the United States, against its will, that the existing regime in Russia is based upon the negation of every principle of honor and good faith and every usage and convention underlying the whole structure of international law—the negation, in short, of every principle upon which it is possible to base harmonious and trustful relations, whether of nations or of individuals.

The responsible leaders of the regime have frequently and openly boasted that they are willing to sign agreements and undertakings with foreign powers while not having the slightest intention of observing such undertakings or carrying out such agreements. This attitude of disregard of obligations voluntarily entered into they base upon the theory that no compact or agreement made with a non-Bolshevist government can have any moral force for them. They have not only avowed this as a doctrine but have exemplified it in practice.

Indeed, upon numerous occasions the responsible spokesmen of this power and its official agencies have declared that it is their understanding that the very existence of bolshevism in Russia, the maintenance of their own rule, depends, and must continue to depend, upon the occurrence of revolutions in all other great civilized nations, including the United States, which will overthrow and destroy their governments and set up Bolshevist rule in their stead. They have made it quite plain that they intend to use every means, including, of course, diplomatic agencies, to promote such revolutionary movements in other countries.

It is true that they have in various ways expressed their willingness to give "assurances" and "guaranties" that they will not abuse the privileges and immunities of diplomatic agencies by using them for this purpose. In view of their own declarations, already referred to, such assurances and guaranties cannot be very seriously considered.

Moreover, it is within the knowledge of the Government of the United States that the bolshevist Government is itself subject to the control of a political faction with extensive international ramifications through the Third International, and that this body, which is heavily subsidized by the Bolshevist Government from the public revenues of Russia, has for its openly avowed aim the promotion of bolshevist revolutions throughout the world. The leaders of the Bolsheviki have boasted that their promises of noninterference with other nations would in no way bind the agents of this body.

There is no room for reasonable doubt that such agents would receive the support and protection of any diplomatic agencies the Bolsheviki might have in other countries. Inevitably, therefore, the diplomatic service of the Bolshevist Government would become a channel for intrigues and the propaganda of revolt against the institutions and laws of countries with which it was at peace, which would be an abuse of friendship to which enlightened governments cannot subject themselves.

In the view of this Government there cannot be any common ground upon which it can stand with a power whose conceptions of international relations are so entirely alien to its own, so utterly repugnant to its moral sense. There can be no mutual confidence or trust, no respect even, if pledges are to be given and agreements made with a cynical repudiation of their obligations already in the minds of one of the parties. We cannot recognize, hold official relations with, or give friendly reception to the agents of a government which is determined and bound to conspire against our institutions; whose diplomats will be the agitators of dangerous revolt; whose spokesmen say that they sign agreements with no intention of keeping them.

To summarize the position of this Government, I would say, therefore, in response to Your Excellency's inquiry, that it would regard with satisfaction a declaration by the Allied and Associated Powers that the territorial integrity and true boundaries of Russia shall be respected. These boundaries should properly include the whole of the former Russian Empire, with the exception of Finland proper, ethnic Poland, and such territory as may by agreement form a part of the Armenian State.

The aspirations of these nations are legitimate. Each was forcibly annexed, and their liberation from oppressive alien rule involves no aggression against Russia's territorial rights and has received the sanction of the public opinion of all free peoples. Such a declaration presupposes the withdrawal of all foreign troops from the territory embraced by these boundaries, and in the opinion of this Government should be accompanied by the announcement that no transgression by Poland, Finland, or any other power, of the line so drawn will be permitted.

Thus only can the Bolshevist regime be deprived of its false but effective appeal to Russian nationalism and compelled to meet the inevitable challenge of reason and self-respect which the Russian people, secure from invasion and territorial violation, are sure to address to a social philosophy that degrades them and a tyranny that oppresses them.

The policy herein outlined will command the support of this Government.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurance of my highest consideration.

BAINBRIDGE COLBY.

His Excellency, Baron CAMMILLO ROMANO AVEZZANO,
Ambassador of Italy.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not intend to take the time of the Senate to discuss generally the question of the recognition of Russia. I have been an advocate of that policy for many years and have expressed myself on the subject so often that I could but reiterate what I have heretofore said. Perhaps it is a useless waste of energy to discuss the subject further at any time, but with the measure for farm relief pending I shall be brief on this occasion. I observe from the able speech of the Senator from Indiana that those who are opposing recognition are also reiterating what has heretofore often been said. I do not care to thresh over old arguments. But every once in a while there is an accession to the ranks of those who believe in the recognition of Russia, and with the advent of a new advocate often come new ideas, at least newly and more interestingly presented. So I shall content myself in the main with calling attention to the views of a distinguished person who has recently expressed his views on this subject.

No one has stated the proposition of the recognition of Russia more briefly and yet more comprehensively than ex-Governor Smith, of New York. In an editorial appearing in his magazine, the New Outlook, in the April number of 1933, he discusses the subject, as I say, briefly but convincingly. I read only one paragraph. The remainder I shall ask to have inserted in the RECORD in full.

Russian propaganda in this and other countries is also offered as a reason against recognition. I don't know how wide-spread Russian propaganda is, and I don't believe anyone else knows. In fact, there is considerable doubt as to whether the Russian Government actually is attempting to undermine other governments. If so, I am not afraid of what it will accomplish here.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield right there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. There should be no doubt about the Russian Government undermining other governments or attempting it. They admit it. I have just quoted from the thesis of the twelfth plenum of last November, the statement by both Joseph Stalin and the quotation of the thesis itself, showing that is what they are doing.

Mr. BORAH. I am aware, Mr. President, of the supposed statements referred to by the Senator from Indiana, but I express my belief, based upon as thorough investigation as I have been able to give to the subject, that there has never been since Mr. Stalin became dictator of the Russian Government any attempt whatever upon the part of the Soviet Republic to interfere with the governmental affairs of the United States or to seek by propaganda to interfere with the governmental affairs of this country. Mr. Stalin well said, the Russian people have their own task to perform, their own problem to solve, and the best way for them to demonstrate that communism is a success, to satisfy the remainder of the world, is to demonstrate that it is a success in Russia, and that they will give their entire attention and consideration to that matter. In my opinion, the charge that the Soviet Government is seeking to undermine or destroy our Government is an exploded and absurd proposition.

Mr. President, the fear as to the effect of propaganda in the United States is based upon the supposition that the intelligence, character, and patriotism of the people of the United States are matters of grave doubt. It is my belief that if you would empty the entire amount of propaganda which is supposed to be gathered upon the borders of the United States into the laps of the people of the United States it would not have the slightest effect upon the thought and purpose of the people of the United States or their loyalty to our Government. The people of the United States are perfectly capable of reading, reflecting, and thinking over the different propositions which are presented to the world in different ways and of determining for themselves what is wise and what is not.

If I did not believe in the intelligence and the patriotism of the people of the United States, I might be afraid that they would be misled by propaganda of that kind; but as I do believe in their intelligence and patriotism I have no such fear whatever. I am not willing to base our foreign policies upon the theory that our own people are weaklings susceptible to every intellectual wind that blows.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I suppose the Senator from Idaho thinks it would be a perfectly fine thing to have a Russian Embassy established in Washington, which could be used as a center for propaganda looking to the destruction of American institutions? If one would assume, for the sake of argument—trying to agree with the Senator from Idaho, though I do not agree with him at all—that the American people could take care of themselves, what possible advantage could come from having this propaganda constantly spread through the length and breadth of the land?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the fact of having an embassy established here would not aid or facilitate the Russians spreading propaganda in the United States in any substantial respect whatever. One can purchase for 5 cents any information he desires about Russia. During the time that Trotsky was writing for the Saturday Evening Post one could buy all kinds of literature and the entire discussion of the subject for 5 cents. If the 5 cents was not to be had the literature could be had free at the public libraries. It was spread out to the people of the United States. No such literature is being denied the people of the United States. They know precisely what is going on in Russia; they know all that is going on so far as information can be carried by any kind of propaganda, pro or con. Mr. Stalin's biography has been written by friendly persons and circulated throughout the United States. There is constantly appearing in the newspapers all news about Russia; there is constantly appearing the side presented by the Russian people themselves; the arguments, pro and con, upon the Russian question and communism are constantly presented throughout the United States. There is no attempt, in any way of which I know, to prevent the circulation of any facts or arguments as to the wisdom or unwisdom of the great experiment in Russia or any circumstances touching Russian life or conditions in Russia.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If the Senator will yield again, the frank purpose of the Soviet Government in Russia is to destroy, with others, the American system and the American form of government. If that be true—and they admit it is true; they admitted it no farther back than last November in the proceedings of the twelfth plenum and Mr. Stalin himself admitted it, and I think, again in January of this very year, 2 months ago, Stalin made a statement to the same effect, that their purpose is to destroy the American Government and the American system of government and American institutions—what possible reason is there for our going into official partnership with them? What do we get out of it? That is what I should like to know.

Mr. BORAH. I do not concede the Senator's contention, in the first place, that they have any intention of destroying the Government of the United States. Whatever else may be said of the leaders in Russia, they are far too wise to entertain any such thought.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. They admit that they have. I have read it here from their own statements.

Mr. BORAH. They have no intention of destroying the Government of the United States and they know perfectly well that they could not destroy the Government of the United States if they should undertake to do so. How are they going to destroy it? Are they going to land an army or are they going to seduce our own people into their belief? One or the other must be chosen, I suppose. I fear neither; and neither will be undertaken.

I have no fear of their landing an army, even if their ambassador were here. And I have no fear of their propaganda though it come in carload lots.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Is there not more danger of this country being destroyed by 1 percent of the people owning 80 percent of the wealth than there is of a Russian army destroying it?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not want to get into a discussion of that question, because I do not wish, by discussing the Soviet question, to delay the consideration of the bill which is now before the Senate.

Mr. President, I was reading from Governor Smith—and I would much prefer to read from the Governor than to discuss the question myself. His article in the New Outlook continues:

> If so, I am not afraid of what it will accomplish here. There were orators spouting in Union Square when I was a boy, long before communism was heard of, and before socialism became respectable. At that time the fear was that the Socialists would overthrow the Government. As long as we stick to our fundamental principles of free speech and a free press, as a safety valve for the more excited and explosive elements in the community, we need have no fear of foreign propaganda. The Russians have plenty to do at home—

And so forth.

Mr. President, there was a time when we had more confidence in the character and loyalty of our own people and when we were more tolerant in permitting other peoples to work out their own problems and have whatever form of government they desired. It will be remembered—I think it was in April 1792, or 1793—that Washington sent word to his Cabinet to convene in Cabinet session. He advised them that he was going to consider the question of the recognition of the improvised revolutionary government of France. At the time that note was sent out the Government of France consisted of what was known as the Committee of Public Safety, at the head of which was, first, Danton, and afterward Robespierre. These men held in their control the life and property of every man, woman, and child in France. They were the legislative body; the judicial body; they were the executive body; they were the sole Government of France at the time Washington proposed to recognize the Government of France. A short time before, the King of France had been beheaded, and a short time thereafter the Queen of France, the beautiful Marie Antoinette, was beheaded. The guillotine was running red every morning, and from 25 to 50 people were being executed day after day on the guillotine. The revolutionary government had offered to come to the help of any people who wished to overthrow their government. Under these circumstances Washington called his Cabinet together to consider the question of recognizing the Government of France as it then existed.

At that table sat Alexander Hamilton, one of the most powerful intellects in the history of governments. At that table sat Thomas Jefferson, the greatest political philosopher in all the history of the world. Such was the Cabinet and such were the forces and influences with which they had to contend in passing upon the question before them. Yet after less than 1 hour of discussion the Cabinet determined to recognize the Committee of Public Safety, or the Government of France, as it then was. When President Washington was asked why he would recognize a government in whose principles he utterly disbelieved, he stated that it was a bloody road over which France was traveling to democracy, but it was the only road over which she could ever reach a democratic form of government. Neither Washington nor Hamilton nor Jefferson believed in the bloody tenets of the revolutionary leaders of France, but they believed in the great principles which those leaders dimly grasped.

What was happening in England? The great debate was going on day after day between William Pitt and Charles James Fox over the question of recognizing the revolutionary government of France. The argument was asserted day after day in the inimitable language of William Pitt that the Government of France was an organized system arrayed against all other governments. If you turn back and read the speech of William Pitt in February 1801 against the recognition of France, you will find there the same declarations that are now being made against Russia. It was said that France would not keep her treaty promises; that France had agreed to send her army to any people who wanted to overthrow their government; that they had dethroned order and law and ridiculed religion and disowned God.

When finally the time came, some years afterward, that England felt it necessary to recognize the Government of France, Charles James Fox called attention to the fact that they would have done better to have followed the great western leader, George Washington, and to have recognized the French Government years previously.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is there any further analogy in the fact that after the French Government was recognized and Citizen Genét became its Ambassador, he so embroiled himself and the American Republic in difficulties that he had to be dismissed because of that fact?

Mr. BORAH. He was recalled, but the recognition of his Government was not withdrawn. President Washington asked that another representative of the Government of France be sent in the place of Genét. There was no break in diplomatic relations.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, at that time it is quite true, perhaps—there is some difference of opinion—that the statement was made and the charge made that France would not keep her word. I do not think her word is any better today than it then was. She has not paid her debt to this country, but refuses to do so.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose the Senator, however, is not going to move that we sever diplomatic relations with France?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No; I am not going to move in that direction, but if France should get in the same situation that Russia is now in, should follow the same system, and undertake to direct from Paris and from her Embassy here, every activity possible to destroy the Government under which I live and to which I owe allegiance, then, of course, I would insist that her Ambassador be recalled and that we sever diplomatic relations.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I make bold, with the consent of the able Senator from Idaho, to say that, while I do not now speak to the question of Russia, its acknowledgment, or recognition, I ask the Senator if he will not recall that Lord Palmerston, the Premier, following up the question as to France, in a communication and in a public address placed the theory of the recognition of France upon the idea that each country had a right to have its own kind of government and that the recognition of a people for the purpose of trade or any other relationship was not in itself an endorsement of their particular government or their methods; and he referred to the United States, as the able Senator will recall, as continuing its relationship with England, but in nowise endorsing its policies of government.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly, that is a very well-established principle.

Mr. LEWIS. I recall Lord Palmerston's position on that question, because it was specifically addressed to France.

Mr. BORAH. I do not recall the Lord Palmerston letter, but I do, of course, recognize the principle that by recognizing a government or a people we do not endorse either their form of government or the practices of their people. If we did, we would at this time withdraw recognition from several governments I could mention.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Is it not the judgment of the able Senator from Idaho, as a student of history, that, in the great debate to which the Senator has referred, Lord Chatham, the brilliant father of William Pitt, if he had been living, would not have stood with his distinguished son, but rather with Charles James Fox?

Mr. BORAH. I would judge from the elder Pitt's record with reference to the Colonies that that would be true.

Mr. President, we are told that a great many of the countries which have recognized Russia have had difficulties and that the recognition program has not been satisfactory. It reminds me to recall while we read of difficulties we also read that year after year they enlarge their trade agreement with Russia. Only lately have important treaties been concluded with France and Poland. I venture the opinion that the controversy which is now going on between Great Britain and Russia will finally result in an enlarged trade agreement between those countries.

Japan recognized Russia several years ago and in a public statement made the other day by her Premier said that the relationship of the two countries had been entirely satisfactory since the recognition.

There always will be disturbances in the relations between governments, whether there is a full recognition or partial recognition or no recognition; but the governments which have recognized Russia, with one single exception, have continued in that relationship.

However, suppose we put aside all the questions of immediate benefit and judge the situation from the world condition of affairs. We are now about to engage in a world economic conference. How are we going to adjust world economic affairs and leave out Russia? We now have going on intermittently in Geneva a disarmament conference. How are we going to disarm without taking into consideration Russia? How are we going to establish peace throughout the world with one sixth of the earth's surface outside of the family of nations? How are we going to establish an increased price of world commodities without taking into consideration the greatest natural wealth and productive power in the world today outside of the United States, and that is Russia? How can we adjust any of these questions, peace or armaments or economic recovery, without this great country which occupies one sixth of the earth's surface? How can we restore economic solidarity and adjust the problems which are driving the whole world to misery and ruin and leave out Russia?

It is not because Russia stands in such need of recognition and not of any particular advantage to the people of the United States that we need argue this, but I ask in all sincerity of the advocates of the World Court, of the League of Nations, those who hope something may come of the economic conference, of the disarmament program, how can you hope to achieve ultimate and final success without considering the Russian people and the Russian Government? How can you win world peace, how can you restore amity and confidence among the nations if you leave out 160,000,000 people in possession of one sixth of the earth, and of the greatest undeveloped wealth on the globe? You meet Russia at every move. You may ignore her, but at the disarmament conference, at the economic conference, at every gathering where men meet to solve the world's problems, there is Russia. We cannot avoid taking her into consideration. Why not, therefore, meet her as one of the family of nations, and by doing so greatly advance the solutions of the problems for which the world anxiously awaits?

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in my remarks the editorial of ex-Governor Smith, to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New Outlook, April 1933]

RECOGNIZE RUSSIA

The Senate Finance Committee at Washington invited a number of people to appear and to offer their ideas as to recovery. In the course of my remarks I strongly advocated the recognition of Russia. This was no unconsidered recommendation. I had come to this conclusion for a number of reasons and after analyzing a great many objections.

One of the principal objections is that Russia owes us money because of debts contracted before we entered the war. As a matter of fact, it turns out that we sold considerable material to the Kerensky government on the supposition, which proved to be a poor guess, that Kerensky would last. It is common knowledge that a good deal of what we sent over never reached Kerensky. The amount involved is not great. It is true also that private property of American citizens was taken by the Soviet Government after the revolution. So was all other private property. As against this, we must not forget that we maintained armies in Russia and Siberia, which did considerable damage and cost the natives much money, at a time when we were not at war with Russia and had no possible excuse under international law for keeping troops on her territory. In any adjustment this army invasion must be balanced against whatever Russia owes us. When it is all boiled down, this argument against recognition does not amount to much.

Then we have the argument that we should not trade with Russia because she does not keep her agreements. The fact of the matter is that we are dealing with Russia every day under cover, and that Russia has in this country the so-called Amtorg Trading Corporation, an official body which is carrying on negotiations for exchange of goods every day, and which certainly should not be permitted to function on American soil if trade relations are forbidden. If, on the other hand, we are trading under cover, we might better trade in the open.

Another argument against Russian recognition is that we disapprove of their form and theories of government. This argument runs counter to every sound American tradition. Thomas Jefferson told us that if we did not like our own Government we should do away with it and build up a new one. We have no right to tell another nation how it shall govern itself.

Russian propaganda in this and other countries is also offered as a reason against recognition. I don't know how wide-spread Russian propaganda is, and I don't believe anyone else knows. In fact, there is considerable doubt as to whether the Russian Government actually is attempting to undermine other governments. If so, I am not afraid of what it will accomplish here. There were orators spouting in Union Square when I was a boy, long before communism was heard of, and before socialism became respectable. At that time the fear was that the socialists would overthrow the Government. As long as we stick to our fundamental principles of free speech and a free press, as a safety valve for the more excited and explosive elements in the community, we need have no fear of foreign propaganda. The Russians have plenty to do at home with their 5- and 10-year plans, and with the feeding of a population which has been taken away from the soil and put to unaccustomed work in factories. They are much more likely to become conservative than we are to become radical.

We are not proposing to withdraw our diplomatic representatives from Germany because Hitler and his party have come into power, although there is much in their philosophy which does not appeal to Americans. If anything, they are more extreme than the Communists. Moreover, if the Communist Party in Germany were to succeed Hitler, I don't think we would refuse to recognize the new administration.

My impression is that we could reestablish relations with Russia on favorable terms to both countries if we made the right sort of gesture. I would like to see a commission sent to Russia to negotiate a diplomatic and trade agreement, composed of men like Newton D. Baker, Brig. Gen. William N. Haskell, who had charge of the relief work after the war in Russia and the Near East, Hugh Cooper, the engineer who built the great dam on the Dnieper River, Alexander Legge, the president of the International Harvester Co., and Senator Barkley, of Kentucky, who has made a first-hand study of Russian conditions. A commission of this kind should restore normal relations in short order.

Mr. BLACK obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make just one observation in reply to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BLACK. I am going to submit a request in reference to a bill in which the Senator from Indiana is very much interested, and which request I have every reason to believe will be granted. I sincerely hope that if possible we may take up and dispose of the motion to reconsider. It is a most interesting debate in which the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Indiana have engaged, but I would like to submit the request and if possible have the debate limited to the motion to reconsider. I am sure, from information coming to me, that it will not take very long.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Will the Senator permit me to make just a short statement in response to what was said by the Senator from Idaho with reference to France?

Mr. BLACK. Of course, if the Senator insists, I shall do so, but I shall greatly appreciate it if he will let us proceed with the motion to reconsider. I am sure he will do anything in his power to further the cause of the bill to which the motion refers.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am very much in sympathy with the Senator's bill, and I expect to do anything I can to assist him.

Mr. BLACK. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield for the purpose indicated?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, there is no analogy, as I see it, at all between the French Revolution and the Russian situation today. The French Revolution ran its course for a few years. Napoleon appeared and took the matter in hand and the ideals of the French Revolution disappeared instantly. Napoleon set up his own ideals which were far more conservative than those of any country in Europe. He undertook to set up a most conservative throne and found a most conservative dynasty and did everything he could to get the good will of the leaders of the various governments all over the world. He did not deliberately attempt by radical philosophy to undermine other governments. Then, of course, followed recognition, and then followed a system of official intercourse with other nations. Diplomatic relations were reestablished.

When Russia gets to the point where she is willing to look after her own business and permit America to attend to hers, to have the kind of government she wants in her own country and permit America to enjoy the kind of government Americans desire here, then I shall be willing to recognize officially that Government; but until that is done I shall not be willing.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am glad to know that some time or other the Senator from Indiana will consider recognition of Russia. The Senator calls attention to the fact that the French Revolution ran its course and Napoleon succeeded and that recognition was had, and so forth. May I invite the Senator's attention to the fact that when the debate took place between Pitt and Fox, Napoleon was then in charge of affairs and was Emperor of France.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes; and may I suggest to the Senator from Idaho that practically all the nations of Europe at one time had refused to sustain diplomatic relations with the French Emperor, both when he became First Consul and after he became the Emperor and had had himself crowned. Even then he was considered by Heaven's anointed on the thrones of Europe more or less as a parvenu among royalty, and they refused to recognize him and at heart continued their refusal until they had destroyed him. But he controlled practically all of Europe by the force of his sword.

Mr. BORAH. I must have misunderstood the Senator. I understood the Senator to say that after Napoleon came to the throne, England and other governments recognized the Government of France.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Alabama for yielding to me.

6-HOUR DAY AND 5-DAY WEEK—MOTION TO RECONSIDER

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to consider the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to reconsider the vote by which the 6-hour day and 5-day week bill was passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. McNARY. Withholding decision in the matter for the moment, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	Kendrick	Reynolds
Ashurst	Costigan	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.
Austin	Couzens	La Follette	Robinson, Ind.
Bachman	Cutting	Lewis	Russell
Bailey	Dickinson	Logan	Schall
Bankhead	Dieterich	Lonergan	Sheppard
Barbour	Dill	Long	Shipstead
Barkley	Duffy	McAdoo	Smith
Black	Erickson	McCarran	Steiwer
Bone	Fess	McGill	Stephens
Borah	Fletcher	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Frazier	McNary	Thomas, Utah
Brown	George	Metcalf	Townsend
Bulkley	Glass	Murphy	Trammell
Bulow	Goldsborough	Neely	Tydings

Capper	Harrison	Nye	Wagner
Caraway	Hastings	Overton	Walcott
Carey	Hatfield	Patterson	Walsh
Clark	Hayden	Pittman	Wheeler
Connally	Johnson	Pope	White
Coolidge	Kean	Reed

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is the unanimous consent proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have made some inquiry, and I am informed that this motion would lead to such a lengthy debate and discussion that it would seriously delay the farm relief bill. Therefore——

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, before the Senator makes that statement, may I ask him if he has learned who is going to indulge in any lengthy debate? I have been unable to do so. I should like to have the RECORD show the names of those who are against the 30 hour bill, and who are threatening, without letting it be known, to oppose it by long speeches.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. In view of the fact that I made the motion, I wish to repeat a statement that I made yesterday, in substance—that as far as I am concerned, there is not any great length of time desired, and I do not expect to speak more than 25 minutes longer on the motion.

Mr. BLACK. May I also say to the Senator from South Carolina that, in my judgment, there are two major relief measures that need to be passed. One of them is with reference to the agricultural situation and one of them is with reference to the industrial situation. I should like also to state that this afternoon, according to my information, the Secretary of Labor is appearing before the Labor Committee of the House with reference to the particular bill referred to in the motion of the Senator from Florida. I have no reason to believe that it will not promptly receive consideration in the House. As a matter of fact, I have every reason to believe that it will. Realizing the fact that the farm relief bill can not possibly be passed for several days, it seems to me that it is of equal importance that this other bill, affecting the industrial workers, be passed upon. We can pass upon it and send it over to the House and obtain action.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator is going upon the assumption, I presume, that the chairman of the Agricultural Committee is not sympathetic with his bill.

Mr. BLACK. Oh, no; if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. SMITH. But I must insist that the farm bill has precedence in importance over every other. I hope that by tomorrow evening we can dispose of it. I hope so. I think every Senator here has practically made up his mind as to what he is going to do about the bill. So far as the labor proposition which the Senator from Alabama has in charge is concerned, it will not suffer greatly by a few days' delay, because it will pass again, as it passed before. Therefore I must insist that the regular order be carried out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the regular order is demanded.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to make a few remarks with reference to the situation.

No one is more anxious than I am that we proceed with this farm-relief legislation. As a matter of fact, we have been here since 12 o'clock, and it has not received any discussion whatever. I agree fully with the Senator that when this motion for reconsideration is taken up the Senate will vote it down. I have no sort of question about that. I agree fully with the Senator that the speeches that are to be made, either by me or by anyone else, are not likely to have any effect with reference to the vote upon the matter. I think the Senate has its mind made up. It has developed that fact. I do think, however, that there is a deliberate undercover effort—not on the part of the Senator from Florida—to delay action upon this motion for reconsideration. Of course, while that is being done, 150 to 200 telegrams per day are reaching Members of the House. I do not anticipate that even that will have any effect. In my judgment, the day has passed when the small group that formerly determined the type of legislation for the people of America any longer control. They are not going to control the matter in the House; and it will be discovered when the vote is taken that all of this attempted pressure with reference to this particular legislation will accomplish nothing.

Mr. President, I want it distinctly understood that insofar as the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is concerned, he is in favor of the bill. I understand the importance of the agricultural measure and the duty which devolves upon him to use every possible method to obtain its passage. I regret exceedingly that the objection was not permitted to come from those who have left the impression with the Senator from South Carolina that there are a lot of Senators over there who are ready to debate against this bill. I regret that they did not make the objection. I do not believe that they are there.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORBECK. I just want to say that I was on the floor for the purpose of objecting at the time. I was not reached, however, because the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] did the objecting. I object solely to the setting aside of the agricultural bill. I should have no objection to voting on the Senator's bill if it could be done immediately; but I, for one, in my own name, want to object to displacing the agricultural bill.

Mr. BLACK. I understand that the Senator wants to object on that ground.

Mr. NORBECK. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I fully appreciate that; but the regret I have is that the Senator does not leave the objection to be made by those who are not coming out in the open and making the objection, but who are against the bill, and who are not objecting on account of the fact that they favor, as does the Senator, the farm bill.

Mr. NORBECK. I have assumed that one objection is sufficient, and I have made my objection.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. NORBECK. I have no objection to getting a vote on the Senator's bill if we can get it soon, but I do not want the agricultural bill displaced. It is the most important thing before the country, and it has been kicked around now for 12 years, and I want to get a vote on it.

Mr. BLACK. I fully appreciate that, just as I do the position of the Senator from South Carolina. The Senator wants to go ahead with the farm bill, which is perfectly natural; and by reason of his long interest in agriculture, along with those others here, it is perfectly natural that he should feel that he wants the farm bill to proceed.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent when the Senate meets tomorrow at 12 o'clock, without going through the formality of making a motion to adjourn, the Senate take up the 30 hour bill; that the pending measure be temporarily laid aside to enable the Senate to take it up tomorrow at 12 o'clock, and that we vote on the bill at 2 o'clock, and that no Senator be permitted to speak more than once or longer than 25 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COPELAND in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, does the Senator make that proposal conditional on the farm bill having been passed in the meanwhile? If he does, I have no objection.

Mr. BLACK. I may state to the Senator that I am making the proposal on the theory that we could move to adjourn and have 2 hours to take up the 30 hour bill tomorrow morning.

Mr. NORBECK. No; I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection has been made.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, if for any reason I am out of the Chamber when a motion to recess is made, I desire to request of those who are here that a quorum may be called, in order that I may be here to move that the Senate adjourn.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment on page 25 of the bill.

Mr. MCNARY. Is that Part 3, Cost of Production?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. MCNARY. I think we should have a quorum, and I suggest the absence of one.

Mr. SMITH. I did not hear the statement of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MCNARY. When part 3 was reached last evening, on account of its importance and the time given to it by the committee, I suggested that it go over until today. There are a number of Senators who, I know, desire to be here. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SMITH. I concur in the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Carey	Gore	McNary
Ashurst	Clark	Hale	Metcalf
Austin	Connally	Harrison	Murphy
Bachman	Coolidge	Hastings	Neely

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

The question is on the amendment on page 25 of the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, as I understand it, we have reached part 3 of the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Part 3, on page 25.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee this question: This committee amendment had its origin in the committee alone as a part of the general scheme of the bill, which has had the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. SMITH. This provision was incorporated in the bill by the committee alone, and I should like to have the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] explain the amendment to the Senate, as he really is the author of it. It was offered by him and accepted by the committee. So I should like to have the Senator from Nebraska explain the situation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the principle involved in this amendment is not new. It has been one of the subjects of consideration and discussion in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and in the Senate on several occasions for quite a number of years.

The bill in its general purpose gives broad powers to the Secretary of Agriculture, providing that he shall have the authority to follow certain lines set out in the bill. Provision for a processing tax has been included in the bill, under which the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury would have control. The assessing of the tax is provided for, the tax to be levied upon the processor, with the idea of getting to the producer, the farmer, a price which, under existing conditions, would buy as much as the same amount of commodity would have purchased during the year that is set aside as the base period.

There is a great similarity between that provision and the one now under consideration, and the committee decided to add to the authority by setting up this plan, which the Secretary could use the same as he could the other. He could apply one plan to one commodity to which he thought it had particular application, and another plan to a different commodity. I presume he could apply a plan in one section of the country different from what he would use in another section of the country in relation to the same commodity. His authority would be almost unlimited.

Instead of trying to reach the base period by getting the price up to what it was in that period, so far as its ability to purchase commodities is concerned, it provides for the cost of production to the farmer who produces the article.

Suppose we apply it to wheat. The Secretary would ascertain the cost of production from the reports and statistics in his office and make an estimate as to the probable amount of domestic consumption of wheat. Having the figures as to the total amount produced, he would be able to deduct one from the other and find the amount that would have to be exported; in other words, the amount that could not be consumed in this country. This provision would give him authority to give to the farmer cost of production for that part of the product that is consumed in the United States.

Mr. President, briefly, that is the object of the whole thing. It can be carried out, in my judgment, by the employment of as small a number of men as under any other plan in the bill. The Secretary would carry out the provision, very likely, by licensing the dealers—using wheat again for an illustration, the elevator men. The elevator man would take the cost of production fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture in his proclamation for that part of the product brought to him that would be for home consumption. The balance would be sold just as it is now, controlled and handled, probably, in the same way it is controlled and handled now.

Let us say that the Secretary, in his estimate, found that the total production of wheat for the year under consideration would be 800,000,000 bushels, and that his estimate showed that there would be domestically consumed and kept for seed 600,000,000 bushels. That would mean that 200,000,000 bushels would have to be exported. If a man brought to the elevator a thousand bushels of wheat, the elevator would be required to pay him the cost of production, as it had been settled by the Secretary of Agriculture, for 750 bushels, and the balance they could settle among themselves. The price probably would be fixed by the world market price, just as it is now.

As to the machinery for carrying out the measure, the Secretary of Agriculture, as he would under all the other parts of the program, would have almost unlimited authority to arrange matters. I think that, in a nutshell, tells just what the object is.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Would it be fair to say that both of these schemes are essentially price-fixing schemes, but that the formula to which the Senator now addresses himself goes straight to the mark, avoids all necessity for a taxing system in order to make it work, avoids all necessity for a complicated system of administration and supervision, and is a straight short cut to the objective which the other part of the bill pretends to reach?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think that is a fair statement of it.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I observe from a reading of the bill, and from the Senator's explanation, that the provisions in this part apply to local or intrastate purchases, as well as to interstate purchases.

Mr. NORRIS. My idea would be that he would take care of that with his regulations.

Mr. GEORGE. There seems to be no distinction made in the measure.

Mr. NORRIS. Probably not. I was here and listened to the inquiry propounded yesterday to the Senator from South Carolina by the Senator from Kentucky. It occurred to me that the difficulty, if it were a difficulty, would be easily handled by the Secretary of Agriculture. If the bill does need amendment in that respect, certainly it ought to be amended. I should not like to compel the Secretary in making his regulations to go as far as indicated in the illustration used by the Senator from Kentucky yesterday, so that if one farmer sold another one a plug of tobacco he might find himself liable for a penalty under this proposed law.

The suggestion was also made to me today by one of the Senators here that the penalty probably is too severe, and I was rather impressed with the suggestion that it ought to be a civil penalty, rather than a criminal penalty. As far as I am concerned, all I am interested in is having the power vested, and the penalty sufficiently strong so that it will bring about an acquiescence in the act.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to ask if there is anything anywhere in this amendment which would exclude an international purchase. That is to say, suppose a processor of feed for cattle should purchase the raw material just north of the Canadian line, say a mile and a half or so from his plant. Must he also be held a criminal for entering into that contract, if he pays a smaller price than that fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, he may pay a larger price if he wants to, but he ought to pay at least the price fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture. If we are to make the bill effective we cannot put anything into it or anything in the regulations that would enable two men to contract for a lesser price for that part of the product that is to be consumed domestically. If we do that, we will have nullified the law.

I realize that it is a severe method of dealing with the situation. I realize that all of these plans are severe, and I can imagine hardships that would come here or there. I can imagine many difficulties that would come in the administration of the law. Some of them, as to some commodities, would be insurmountable. After all, no man can tell how any of these plans, if put into effect on any particular commodity, is going to work.

We might just as well face the truth and realize that we are not dealing with certainties. We are to a great extent performing an experiment. We are confronted with the fact that the farmer is producing the food we eat and the products from which the clothes we wear are made at a financial loss to himself, and has been doing so for quite a number of years, and it is only recently that the rich and the poor alike, the man in the city as well as the man in the country, have begun to realize that that is true. They are confronted with the fact that we cannot go on indefinitely in this way and live. Our country must fail, our very civilization cannot exist, if the farmers of the country, who represent the foundation stone of our temple of prosperity, cannot get cost of production. We are all realizing that, and we are all anxious to give it to the farmer. Things have gone very far, however. Nobody has heeded the voices which have been crying out for 10 years calling attention to the fact that we are rapidly approaching that kind of a condition. Now we realize it. Everybody concedes it; and every man, whatever may be his walk in life, is anxious, I think, honestly and conscientiously anxious, to remedy the situation. We disagree about how we should go about it, and if we are fair in our hearts with ourselves we must realize that no man absolutely knows what to do. There is no mathematical demonstration that can be given. Yet we are confronted with the condition; and, as honest men, as conscientious men, we have to take our chances. It is necessary that we should delegate some powers to someone to deal with conditions as to which we cannot state in advance what they are going to be and as to which, therefore, we cannot legislate. We have got to do this in order to give to the producers of the food which we eat a price equal to the cost of production and so save our country and our civilization.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. There is a practical difficulty about this particular section of the bill which I should like to have the Senator explain and to indicate. I desire to know how it may be surmounted. Nearly every agricultural commodity will be embraced in this legislation, and as to many such commodities there will be a first grade, a second grade, and a third grade. Take hogs. There will be in one litter high-grade pigs and also runts. It costs as much, if not more, to develop the second grade, the runts, as it does the first grade; indeed, I think it costs more. The difficulty arises when we consider whether the sale of the lower or more costly grade to produce can be made on the cost-of-production basis.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Ohio has presented a question that is difficult to answer. In answer I am going to take something different from hogs.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Nebraska may select anything else.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say to the Senator that if I were Secretary of Agriculture and were called upon to put the proposed legislation into effect, I never would start with hogs. I was one member of the committee who wanted to strike out every basic agricultural product except wheat and cotton.

Mr. FESS. That ought to have been done.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it ought to have been done, but we were not able to do it. I was impressed with the desire of the Secretary of Agriculture to keep hogs and corn in; he wanted them kept in, and said so. I have no objection to keeping them in and letting the Secretary try it, though I doubt very much, I will say to the Senator from Ohio, whether in the case of hogs he could make this plan work. Personally I agree with the Senator and think he has presented a question that is very difficult to answer, and, so far as I am concerned, I cannot answer. However, if he were to select wheat, then I could answer it. There are different grades of wheat, as there are of hogs.

Mr. FESS. Very well; I should like to have the Senator from Nebraska answer my question in its application to wheat.

Mr. NORRIS. When we fixed the price of wheat during the World War, we fixed it for a certain grade at a certain market, all other grades bearing their certain relationship to the grade the price of which we fixed. Under this bill the Secretary of Agriculture would, by his regulations, I should think, fix the price for a certain grade of wheat, assuming that he is going to apply it to wheat. He does not have to apply it to anything, if he does not want to, nor does he have to apply it to hogs or to corn. He could pick out whatever commodities he desired to make the application to. If he should select, in the case of wheat, Hard No. 1 Northern or No. 2, all the wheat better than that or lower than that in grade would bear a certain fixed relation to the standard fixed. So the price would go below or above the standard fixed, as the case might be. I do not think there will be much difficulty about fixing that. We had to fix it during the war, and we fixed it by regulation which controlled the price of wheat. I concede that in the case of some of the other commodities it would seem to me it would be impossible to make the plan work; but if I were Secretary of Agriculture, I would try it on the commodities which I believed were the easiest to handle, because, God knows, it is going to be difficult to operate the plan as to any of them.

Mr. FESS. I desire to ask the Senator another question, if he will permit me. I cannot see how the Secretary could enforce that feature which makes the plan applicable only to that portion of commodities which are domestically consumed, though the Senator, I think, gave the illustration of that a moment ago. If a farmer raised 600 bushels of wheat and sold it to a miller, and we proceed on the assumption that there will be consumed 600,000,000 bushels and that there will be produced 800,000,000, we will consume three fourths of the domestic production at home.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Then the miller would pay the tax on only three fourths of the 600 bushels, or on 450 bushels.

Mr. NORRIS. That is just as is now provided; there is no change made in that respect.

Mr. FESS. So that clears up the question as to just how that would operate.

Mr. NORRIS. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that, as the Senator from Michigan has so well stated, that compared with the other plans, this provides quite a simple method of reaching the result.

Mr. FESS. It is the feature as to pricefixing which disturbs me, outside of the general opposition to the Government's going into this field.

Mr. NORRIS. It also disturbs me, but I will say to the Senator from Ohio that we shall, I think, have to give up some of the notions which we entertain; we shall have to surrender some of our cherished opinions. We are confronted with a predicament that never before confronted the world, and many of us have got to compromise with the ideas we have held during our entire lifetime and which have become a part of our make-up and our system. That is the reason, it seems to me, why we are justified in affording to the Secretary of Agriculture as many methods which he may try as can show any prospect of being successful. The Secretary of Agriculture can apply part 3 to wheat if he so wishes; he can take part 2 and apply it to hogs; and he can take another part and apply it to cotton if he so desires. He will find that some of the remedies proposed are more easily applied to some particular commodities than they are to others, and that to some they cannot be applied at all.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. To the best of my knowledge, the most serious objection to this provision of the bill comes from those who claim that it is impossible to find a basis upon which to determine the cost of production. They say that the cost of production cannot be ascertained. I wish to call attention to the principle underlying the present tariff act and to all other tariff acts in the history of the American system of protection. The slogan has been the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. If we can determine the cost of production for the purposes of tariff making, which must be done if we are going to base the rate of duty on the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, we must know the cost of production not only at home but also know the cost of production abroad; and I beg to submit that, if we can do that for the purpose of tariff making, we can do it also for the purpose of price fixing. I thank the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Minnesota. Perhaps I ought to say a word about the cost of production. Again we are confronting a field that we cannot define definitely or mathematically, and we might just as well reach that conclusion to begin with and not deceive ourselves. No man, no set of men, can hope to be mathematically correct when they undertake to fix the cost of production. I realize that of itself is a different thing. It will be necessary for compromises to be made, and when that is done the result will not be mathematically correct.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in just a moment. But we hope the Secretary of Agriculture, who we all know is moved by the highest and the best motives, will do the best he can under the very difficult situation. I now yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that if the farmer does not obtain the cost of production, and do it pretty soon, it will only postpone the inevitable ultimate bankruptcy and extinction of the farmer. That is axiomatic. If he gets less for what he produces and sells than it costs to produce it, his business, like every other business in the world, cannot live and exist under such conditions. I do not believe, if the Senator will allow me further, that there is any difficulty in ascertaining the average cost of production of our staple agricultural commodities, such as wheat, corn, and cotton. They are subject to a more reasonable approach to the cost of production than a great many manufactured articles which are produced more or less as byproducts in connection with the articles of principal manufacture. I do not think there is any difficulty here at all. I think the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] has suggested an idea that makes it absurd to think that we cannot determine the cost of production of wheat, for instance, when we have already put a tariff on wheat based on that determination. The tariff on wheat was adjusted to measure the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, and it seems to me that it is imperatively necessary that the farmer should now obtain at least the cost of production.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator that that is imperatively necessary. Yet, of course, even in tariff matters, it is impossible to determine mathematically to a cent the cost of producing any manufactured article. The cost varies in different parts of the country.

Mr. WALSH. Depending upon the efficiency of the producer.

Mr. NORRIS. Absolutely. It is necessary to take into consideration a number of items.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in just a moment. But we are confronting the fact here, as in the case the Senator mentioned, that we must approximate. We must not, Mr. President, expect perfection. If we do, we are going to be disappointed. We all ought to realize that the Secretary of Agriculture in executing this bill will be confronted with the most difficult task that has ever faced a public official and that he will undoubtedly make mistakes; he would not be human if he did not do so. He will do many things differently from how I would do them or from how the Senator from Michigan would do them, but we must permit him to do the best that he can and satisfy his own conscience and his own judgment. When he fixes, for instance—if he applies it to wheat—the cost of production of wheat, there will be some farmers for whom the cost of production thus fixed will be too high, and there will be others for whom it will be too low. It will be an arbitrary determination of an impossible situation. Somebody, however, must determine it; it must be determined, for everyone now concedes we cannot go on unless the farmer gets the cost of production. I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I want to make clear that I agree with the Senator from Nebraska as to the difficulty of mathematically and correctly determining the average cost of production of any given commodity. I want to make it clear that I agree with him as to that, but we have fixed the cost of production; we ascertained it for the purpose of tariff making in the case of wheat, for instance, in 1924. No one will claim that we found the actual mathematical cost of production, but we did find the cost of production for the purpose of tariff making. If we now take the position that we cannot find on the same basis the cost of production for the purpose of price fixing, then the foundation of our whole tariff structure, based upon the difference of cost of production at home and abroad, vanishes and has nothing on which to stand.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And I think the Senator may add that any calculations respecting the cost of production under this section of the bill are relatively a kindergarten problem compared to the difficulties under the other sections of the bill; and therefore if there is a justification for the other sections, there certainly is for this section.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator. This, in my opinion, would be the easiest plan laid out in the bill for the Secretary to follow. I realize when I say that, that other men, just as able and conscientious as I, have reached a different conclusion, but I have no hesitancy in saying that so far as simplicity is concerned this plan is away above and beyond any of the others so far as I am able to analyze it.

Mr. President, unless there are other questions, I have nothing more to say. I should like to hasten action on the bill as much as possible.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I want to make this supplementary observation to the remarks that have been submitted by the able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]: I am ready for new experiments to seek a way out of agriculture's troubles. I agree that agriculture's emancipation is prerequisite to America's recapture of prosperity. But we are warned by costly experience that it takes more than legislative sympathy and good will to produce actual farm aid. I have never been one of those who thought this problem could be settled by price fixing, and I do not think so now. I have never been able thus far to escape the conviction that price fixing has been a tragic failure in connection with cotton in Egypt, cattle in the Argentina, rubber in Brazil, nitrates in Chile, sugar in Cuba, coffee in Brazil, silk in Japan, and vegetables in Germany. I realize that in those instances an international situation usually was concerned, while here we are undertaking to deal with the problem within our own confines. But I have never been persuaded that we could accomplish this economic result by the formula of price fixing. I think it promises more harm than good. However, if an effort at price fixing is to be made, in spite of the opposition of those of us who do not believe in it, I know of no reason why it should not be made in the open and frankly as such.

It seems to me that the first sections of the bill under the Wallace-Tugwell-Ezekiel allotment formula constitute price-fixing and nothing else, only it is dressed up with much tortuous camouflage—I am not speaking invidiously—and it has within it the necessity for the collection of a far-flung sales tax and the necessity for a tremendous administrative system to operate it. It has within it many nebulous calculations as to what the mystifying factors are and what the net results are to be. But finally it appears to make a dictator out of the Secretary of Agriculture and to license him to order restraints upon the liberty of action of millions of farmers and to order sales taxes upon the food and clothing of other millions of our citizens—all according to some abstruse calculations which defy present illumination.

I have sat here for 2 days and tried conscientiously to discover precisely how the plan works. I could only come to the conclusion that when we mix Ph.D.'s and R.F.D.'s we are in trouble. When we are all done, however, with the Wallace-Tugwell-Ezekiel parity formula we have fixed a price. I do not think any of us know precisely how it is to be done, nor what the actual net result is to be, nor what is to happen either to the farmer or the Treasury or the consumer as a result, but we have fixed a price. The consumer will pay a minimum of 1½ billions as a result.

I submit that if we are to proceed with price fixing, it would be infinitely better to proceed under the terms of this simpler and more direct part of the bill, because here there is no need for an enormous administrative machine by way of tax collecting. Here there is precious little uncertainty as to what the fixed price, which, by the way, will be an adequate price, is going to be and how it is going to be achieved. There is certainly less uncertainty in this section of the bill than there is in the other sections. I do not refer to the mortgage-relief sections which I heartily favor. I refer to the price-fixing sections. It seems to me if we are to undertake price fixing, the Simpson plan, or the Clair plan, or whatever we may call it, the plan in part 3 of the bill has a thousand times more persuasive credentials than the prior section of the bill.

The prior section of the bill appeals to me precisely as some of the prior farm legislative experiments evidently appealed to the present President of the United States when he made his famous Columbus speech last fall, his famous "Alice in Wonderland" speech, from which I recall a sentence in which he sarcastically referred to the fact that Alice had been "peering into the wonderful looking glass of new economies." I think that is exactly what Alice is peering into this afternoon. When she peers into the first section of this bill, she is peering into one of the strangest medleys of mathematics, necromancy, and logarithms of which I know. Nobody knows the definite answer.

Under part 3 of the bill, if we are going to undertake price fixing, here is a clean-cut, straight shot at the target. It hits the target and it wastes no time. It will kill or cure. There is no lost motion. There is no great and burdensome bureaucracy necessary as a by-product. It is simple and direct, and, furthermore, it is calculated to produce a more substantial farm advantage than any other previous section. If the bill is going to pass and if the administration is going to try price fixing, which I frankly say I regret, I am sincerely sorry that part III seems to be here only by sufferance and that, as the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] said to me the other day, the Secretary of Agriculture does not believe in it and has not wanted it in the bill and that, therefore, it probably means little or nothing even though it is in the bill. I regret that fact.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. May I suggest to the Senator that while I am not speaking with knowledge, yet in my opinion the statement is not warranted that the Secretary of Agriculture does not want this provision in the bill or is opposed to it. He has not said he wants it, but I do not believe the Secretary of Agriculture is opposed to this particular provision of the bill. He talked quite frankly about it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, did the Senator from Nebraska get any impression from anything said before the committee that the Secretary is opposed to it?

Mr. NORRIS. I did not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, if the Senator from Michigan will yield, I shall be glad to send to the desk and have read a statement which Secretary Wallace has sent to me.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let it be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

COST OF PRODUCTION AND FAIR EXCHANGE VALUE

I find there is much misunderstanding about the meaning of the terms "cost of production" and "fair exchange value" as used in this bill. Cost of production means so many different things to different people. There are some who today say that the cost of producing a bushel of wheat is $1.50, whereas others say that it is only 40 cents, and perhaps both are right.

The Department of Agriculture in June of 1932 published figures indicating that for the year 1931, the cost of producing a bushel of wheat in the United States was 81 cents. This figure was an average of 2,930 individual farm reports, and, undoubtedly, some of these farmers reported average costs of more than $2 a bushel, whereas others reported costs of less than 40 cents. The question I would raise is, "Is it fair to take the average cost?" If so, let us project this figure of 81 cents for 1931 into the present situation.

Land values and labor values today are both less than three fourths of what they were in 1931. If the yield this year were the same as in 1931, it is probable that the methods employed by the United States Department of Agriculture would give the cost of producing wheat in 1933 as very little more than 60 cents a bushel.

Figuring the cost of producing cotton in the same way, we get for the year 1933, assuming an average crop, a cost of around 8 cents a pound. In like manner with hogs—if we assume the cost of corn at 20 cents a bushel, man labor at 15 cents an hour, and horse labor at 10 cents an hour—we get a cost per hundredweight, according to competent authorities, of around $2.65 a hundred. These figures, as just cited, are cost of production according to the definition as hitherto customarily employed in the Department of Agriculture.

Frankly, I believe that cost of production, when used as a measuring stick under conditions as they exist today, might do a very real injustice to the farmer. Cost of production, in the sense in which it is ordinarily used, is likely to have written into it a terribly deflated land charge, man labor at 15 cents or less per hour, and horse labor based on unfairly low-priced corn, oats, and hay. The cost of producing hogs which I have given above illustrates what I mean. Everyone knows that if the farmer grows the corn which he feeds to his hogs, it is impossible to produce hogs at $2.65 a hundred. If the farmer buys his corn, however, it may be possible. How can you distinguish between the farmer who grows the corn which he feeds his hogs and the farmer who buys his corn?

Secretary Wallace in 1920, in his book, Agricultural Prices, wrote as follows concerning the theory of cost of production and ratio price:

"Those who have given the most thought to price fixing advocate as a guide 'cost of production plus a reasonable profit.' But what is cost of production? Even in industries so well controlled by man as coal mining, where the weather does not enter in, there are some mines that can produce a ton of coal for two or three dollars, while other mines cannot produce a ton of coal for less than six or seven dollars. The North Dakota wheat farmer, in a year of rust, may produce wheat at a cost of 4 or 5 dollars a bushel, whereas the Kansas farmer the same year may produce wheat at a cost of only a dollar or a dollar and a half per bushel. Shall both the Dakota farmer and the Kansas farmer be paid cost of production plus a reasonable profit for their wheat? From this standpoint we see that there is no such thing as a standard cost of production. A single producer may be able to determine his personal cost of production of a given quantity under a given set of conditions. But in the general sense, as it is commonly thought of, cost of production is a will-o'-the-wisp, a creature that seems to exist but really does not.

"Nevertheless, there is a rough-and-ready method of determining cost of production or just price as distinguished from laissez faire or supply-and-demand price. We refer to the ratio method of price determination. Over a long series of years, cost of production plus a reasonable profit is roughly expressed by the relationship which exists between a raw product and the finished product. In rough form it may be most easily grasped in the case of corn and hogs. Over any long period of years, hogs sell on the Chicago market at a price per hundredweight equal to the Chicago price of 11.5 bushels of corn. When hogs have sold for 14 bushels of corn, they have sold for more than cost of production plus a reasonable profit, while, on the other hand, when they have sold for 9 bushels of corn, they have sold for less than cost of production plus a reasonable profit. All this is not saying that certain producers have not been able to make a profit when hogs have sold for 9 bushels of corn. Neither is it saying that certain producers may not have been selling at a loss when hogs sold for as much as 14 bushels of corn. It is simply saying that it has required the pulling power of a price for hogs which is equal to the price of 11.5 bushels of corn to keep enough men in the hog business year in and year out to supply the demand of this country for hog products during the past 60 years. This is what we mean by the ratio method of price determination. It is the only practical method of determining cost of production in such a business as farming, where there are millions of producers working under a variety of conditions."

The ratio price as described by Secretary Wallace is similar in philosophy to "fair exchange value", as described in this bill. The difference is that fair exchange value concerns itself with a ratio between the price of certain basic agricultural products and the price of things which farmers buy. Secretary Wallace said in the statement which I have just quoted, "It has required the pulling power of a price for hogs which is equal to the price of 11.5 bushels of corn to keep enough men in the hog business year in and year out to supply the demand of this country for hog products during the past 60 years."

In like manner, I say that in the long run there must be paid a fair exchange value for farm products in order to result in the production of enough food to keep people from starving to death in this country. I make this statement advisedly, realizing that a whole generation of farmers may produce food for far less than a fair exchange value before they and their children finally give up in despair. We do not wish the answer of brute nature red in claw and fang. To avoid such an outcome, we want to get true cost of production to our farmers as rapidly as conditions will permit. That is the object of this bill. I believe the true "cost of production" is "fair exchange value" as defined in this bill. Frankly, I am afraid of the term "cost of production" as used in part 3 of this bill. It is too elusive; there are too many kinds of cost of production. It would be possible for a Secretary of Agriculture equipped with one set of prejudices to do a grave injustice in this part of the bill to the farmers, whereas another Secretary of Agriculture, with a different set of prejudices, might do a grave injustice to the consumers.

What we want is the conception of a just price which maintains an even balance between producers and consumers. Fair exchange value, as defined in part 2 of this bill, is a mathematical effort to define such just price. I am willing to admit, of course, that the price ratio between the things which farmers sold in the pre-war period and the things which farmers bought may not necessarily represent in all particulars a fair exchange value today. It may be said on the one hand that the use of combines today makes it possible to produce wheat for a somewhat lower price than fair exchange value calculated in this way would indicate. On the other hand, it may be said that the impoverishment of our soil which has taken place may render necessary an increased use of fertilizer which would cause the true fair exchange value to vary in the opposite direction.

These niceties of ratio-price determination cannot be gone into in a time of emergency like this. I believe that the fair exchange value as set forth in this bill approximates very closely to true cost of production and that it is essentially much closer to true cost of production than the figures printed annually by the United States Department of Agriculture. These figures, unfortunately, have written into them the depression in land values and hired farm labor of the year preceding. They have written into them the results of the unbalanced situation which has been with us so long. We are now striving for a state of true balance, and the concept of the fair exchange value will help us to realize that state.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Alabama who is the author of this treatise which has just been read? No name was announced at the desk.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is a statement that has been sent up, written by Secretary Wallace.

Mr. VANDENBERG. This is Secretary Wallace's statement?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes, sir.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I say sincerely that I have profound respect for Secretary Wallace and his good faith and his earnest dedication to this perplexing problem, and I am in no position—and it would be absurd to pretend to be—to discuss even the outside rim of the technicalities which he has submitted in this very interesting discussion. But so far as I am concerned the proposition continues to be complicated confusion and nothing else.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. What has become of Mordecai in this matter?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, Dr. Mordecai Ezekiel is the logarithms expert, and this discussion is a bit broader.

I submit that every reference in the letter just read at the desk to the difficulties and the complications involved in the application in the cost-of-production plan applies even more emphatically to the Wallace-Tugwell-Ezekiel formula, and that just as the cost-of-production formula appears to be inscrutible to the Secretary, so the Secretary and his medley of assistants have sent us a formula which is equally inscrutable to us. No Senator has yet reduced it to comprehensible terms.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is there not this difference: In the previous sections of the bill there is a definite yardstick by which the Secretary may determine, in the base period of 1909–14, the average price of farm products and their relationship to purchasing power during the same period, and it is a rather simple mathematical process to determine the difference between the average of that period and the actual price brought to the farmer of any products covered in this bill, whereas in the amendment which has been put in the bill by the committee there is no yardstick. There is no period which is regarded as the base period. The cost of production to be arrived at by the Secretary of Agriculture, and thereafter proclaimed, must be a variable yardstick. It must apply to each crop each year, and to all types of each crop each year.

Is there not considerably more difficulty in arriving at an average cost of production, for instance, we will say, of tobacco, where there are some 45 or 50 different types, each of them bringing a different price, each of them depending upon different circumstances for its market, than in fixing a general average over a period of 4 or 5 years, and then using that as the yardstick for future calculations?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the Senator suggests that under the Wallace-Tugwell-Ezekiel formula there is a definite, dependable yardstick. Let us see. I submit to the Senator that this is the definition of his dependable yardstick—and I am now quoting the able chairman of the Senate committee, who described the sales tax which is to be applied to the food and clothing of the Nation under the so-called "dependable" yardstick to which the Senator refers. I am now quoting the able chairman of the committee as he submitted his report, and this is his definition of the tax:

> It shall be such a tax as shall raise farm prices to the average parity of farm prices between 1909 and 1914, but the tax shall apply only to that portion of the crop domestically consumed, and it will be so graduated as to find out just what the consumer will take at the advanced price, and just what effect the raise of the price on one commodity may have on something that would be substituted, and what the general consuming public would be able to take at the advanced price.

Is that a fixed and dependable yardstick?

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, it might be; but if we are going to draw an analogy between that and the section now under consideration, we ought to say, "And if anybody buys any of it at less than the average price, he will be put in the penitentiary or fined a thousand dollars."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Kentucky. He is complaining about this yardstick's not being dependable. In my judgment, it is much more dependable and will come much nearer applying to any particular circumstances than any other portion of the bill.

Every year there will be an estimate made of the total production of wheat, for instance. Every year there will be an estimate made of the total amount that will be consumed domestically, and every year there will be an estimate made as to what it cost to produce it. Under the other system of your dependable yardstick you might have several years to take into consideration. It seems to me you will come nearer getting down to getting the cost of production at the particular time when the stuff is produced under this amendment than under any other section of the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further there——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Briefly.

Mr. BARKLEY. The first part of this bill has nothing to do with the cost of production. The average price for the period from 1909 to 1914 takes no account whatever of cost of production. The bill deals with that period as a basis from which to start, and that basis is the average price to the farmer during that 4- or 5-year period——

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. O Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. Calculated in connection with its relative purchasing power during the same period. The question of cost of production does not enter into either one of those equations.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think I shall reclaim the floor to conclude briefly these observations that I was submitting. I had no intention of a prolonged discussion of the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. SMITH. Will the Senator allow me to say just one sentence right there?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the chairman of the committee for one sentence.

Mr. SMITH. The object of the allotment plan is to bring the purchasing power of farm products up to and equal to what it costs the farmer to buy, and that is fixing the price.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I say in conclusion, as I said in the beginning, that it seems to me that if we are to proceed into an adventure in price fixing—which, I repeat, has never persuaded me that it could or would succeed—if we are to proceed into it, I should prefer to proceed frankly under part 3 as submitted and explained by the able Senator from Nebraska, and the reasons are perfectly plain and simple.

The plan at least promises to be more favorable to the farmers in respect to the price to be fixed. The plan is shorn of all needless and costly machinery. It is direct action. It requires no army of inquisitors and tax gatherers and crystal gazers in order to find out what it means and then to administer it. Ultimately it involves no new-born bureaucracy with a lot of cornfield czars in order to make it work. I think it is the simple, direct formula for price fixing, if that is what this Congress is determined to do. I shall vote for a substitute and, I believe, better bill. But I certainly shall vote to keep this cost-of-production section in the present bill, if it is to become the farmer's price-fixing formula. Then, at least, agriculture will be less in need of Einstein to help it thread the maze, and Senators will not require a caucus in order to find the answer to a question or an interpretation.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan is in error about crystal gazing and various other formulas and theories and methods of arriving at this result. It has been computed by well-defined logarithms. They have been ordered printed in the RECORD; and if the Senator has not read them it is simply because he has not taken the time to acquaint himself with the subject matter.

This document that has just come in here, I understand, came from the Secretary of Agriculture. I think this document ought to be printed. It seems to set up a new form of calculation. In fact, it seems that we are getting a new calculus here every few minutes. They ought to be earmarked as to date and hour and minute, so that we will keep up with them; and in case new ideas flitter through the various and sundry gentlemen who are preparing these ingenious documents we will know from the point of time which we are to take and read first, or to regard as superior.

I want to make a suggestion, Mr. President. It is now getting close to Good Friday. Many of our Senators have expressed, so the Senator from Arkansas has informed us, a desire to go to the ball game. This latest—do I interrupt the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; I interrupt the Senator from Louisiana. All hope of recessing for a ball game was abandoned yesterday afternoon.

Mr. LONG. "All hope abandon, ye who enter here." [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; so far as entertainment is concerned, that is true. We must stay on the job.

Mr. LONG. I am going to stay right with the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am glad to hear that, because I did not want to have to send out to the ball park to get the Senator. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. That goes to show that I am one man whom the Senator from Arkansas wants around at all times. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; the Senator understands that perfectly. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, after having read three and a half pages of this epistle, I see that the formula is changed by pages and by paragraphs. I think this document ought to be printed, and that Senators ought to be requested to give it some study before undertaking to proceed too far into this matter. I am told by a Senator sitting near me that it will be printed. That will be of some benefit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the document has been read into the record.

Mr. LONG. I want to state further, Mr. President, that I am advised by the Library of Congress that they have references and records there explaining in simple terms the mythical processes and logarithms of higher mathematics, so that whatever may have been furnished us for our consideration and illumination can be worked out by Senators upon reasonable application for the records to which I have referred, and I am hoping that Senators, in connection with this and other documents which have come and will come, will avail themselves of the material at hand to acquaint themselves with these logarithms so that they will understand the mysteries of the agricultural question, upon which we are now about ready to act.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, in the remarks I am about to make I want to appeal to the reason of those who seriously are interested in the merits or the demerits of the pending bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	Kendrick	Reynolds
Ashurst	Costigan	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.
Austin	Couzens	La Follette	Robinson, Ind.
Bachman	Cutting	Lewis	Russell

Coolidge	Kean	Reed

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I am opposed to the adoption of the pending amendment. I stated my reasons for opposing it in the committee while the amendment was under consideration there, and reserved the right to oppose it when the bill came before the Senate for action.

I am convinced that the amendment does not and cannot serve any useful purpose, either in the administration of the proposed law or in aiding the financial condition of the farmer. My objection is not based upon any opposition to the farmer receiving the cost of production. I think he should receive more than the cost of production. I do not understand how any business venture can progress if its earnings are equal only to the cost of production. There must, of course, be in addition to the cost of production some margin for other purposes which are not included in the factors which constitute the cost of production.

It is my understanding that the cost-of-production amendment as proposed here would bring to the farmer a much lower return than would the pre-war parity basis. It developed here, from the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture, that for years the Department of Agriculture has worked upon the problem of ascertaining the costs of production of various agricultural commodities. The formulas prepared for that purpose, the factors which enter into that program, are not those established by the present Secretary of Agriculture. They are the very ones which have been established by the Department of Agriculture, regardless of its political administration, over a period of years; and, under the factors included by the Department, and which will doubtless be included if this amendment is sought to be put into operation, the cotton farmer will get 8 cents a pound for his cotton on cost-of-production basis, the wheat farmer will get 60 cents a bushel for his wheat, the hog man will get only $2.60 a hundred for his hogs; whereas under the basis established by the pending bill for parity in the purchasing relations between agricultural and industrial commodities the prices of all of the basic commodities in this bill will be higher, much higher, than the figures at which the prices can be placed under the plan limiting it to cost of production.

Unfortunately, many confuse the subject of cost of production with a proper standard of living for the farmer. We are all interested in a higher standard of living for the tillers of the soil. They are entitled to it under all considerations. They work, as we know, around 16 hours a day during a very large part of the year. They work in the sunshine, they work under all sorts of weather and climatic conditions. They take greater risks, of necessity, than any other class of business men in the United States.

The result of their year's work depends in large measure upon the climate. They are affected not only by excessive rains and floods but at times by droughts. They have pests of various kinds to interfere with the result of their labors.

They raise, as we know, the food supply and the products out of which the clothes of all the commercial and industrial people of this country are made, and I say that they are entitled to as high a standard of living as are the people who work in the cities and towns of this country.

Mr. President, when gentlemen talk to me about a mere cost-of-production basis for the farmer being adequate, being sufficient, to give him a standard of living that we would all like to see him have, I submit that I can accept no such formula, no such doctrine, even if that cost of production would bring his price up as high as the pre-war basis provided in this plan.

Mr. President, why incorporate a provision of this sort, which no one can support on any basis of fact that would be helpful to the farmer, that would be better for him now than the other basis, when all of the elements entering into his cost of production are lower than they have been in the recollection of man? With the food for his family, the feed for his stock, the cost of labor, the price of horsepower labor, and all the principal factors entering into the cost of production lower than they have ever been, how can anyone conceive the thought that such a basis will be helpful and beneficial in raising the prices the farmer will receive for his commodities?

I do not care to go into the question of the difficulty and uncertainty in the matter of ascertaining the cost of production. While the cost of producing agricultural commodities of various kinds in different sections of America is one doubtless of extreme difficulty of ascertainment, and while it is much more difficult than ascertaining the cost of production under the tariff law involving articles produced by certain industries, still I can see that it is possible that some reasonable basis might be found for ascertaining the average cost of production of different commodities.

So, not basing my objection upon that administrative difficulty, I do assert, Mr. President, that a program like this left in the bill will result in a constant agitation throughout the country, a constant pressure upon the Department of Agriculture to give to the farmer a price which he is not authorized to receive under this plan if it shall be a cost-of-production plan rather than a standard-of-living plan.

Mr. President, I am not going into the subject of the constitutionality of this measure. My objections are based upon other and fundamental considerations which are clearly, to my mind, injurious to the best interests both of the administration of the bill and its effect upon the farmers themselves. I prefer merely to make it a matter of record that it does seem to me that there is no grant to Congress to fix prices of commodities, whether we consider the question from the standpoint of those moving in interstate commerce or those which are confined solely within the respective States. I am not going to elaborate upon that, but it is my clear conviction that this amendment clearly contravenes the Federal Constitution, is violative of the fifth amendment, and has no basis of authorization in the Federal Constitution.

Mr. President, this is not a price-fixing bill, as has been said by the Senator from Michigan. It does not fix the price of any commodity, but, on the contrary, simply gives power to the Secretary of Agriculture to raise from time to time as best he may, under prevailing marketing and consuming conditions, the price the farmer may get in the market by way of benefits for his commodities. Instead of being a price-fixing bill it is simply a price-raising bill. There is no minimum price suggested in the bill; there is no maximum price suggested in the bill. There is nothing suggested, except that, so far as possible consistent with the best interests of the consumers and the public at large, farm commodities shall bring a price commensurate with and measured by the exchange value of those commodities for the same amount of commodities produced in industry which the farmer must purchase.

I know the motives of the Senator from Nebraska in this matter are pure; I know he is interested in trying to help the farmer. We have worked together in the committee for 2 years. I am sure that every member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has the same motive, the same purpose, the same anxiety to do everything in his power to aid the financial condition of the farmer. However, let me ask the Senator from Nebraska, in case he has not given it consideration—and I know he wants to give consideration to every angle of this problem—to consider, for instance, cotton. Under this amendment the domestic allotment of cotton for next year will be about 5,000,000 bales, for which the buyer, under the terms of the bill, must pay the cost of production. How will that work out? To begin with, Mr. President, we have a carry-over in America of more than 13,000,000 bales of cotton, almost all of it now resting in the warehouses and compresses of the country, out of the hands, in large part, of the producers. That excess or surplus of cotton is included in the amount that is covered by the domestic-allotment plan. Out of that 13,000,000 bales, plus another crop of 13,000,000 or 14,000,000 bales, only 5,000,000 bales can be sold at the cost of production, without other benefits to the cotton grower, for there are no advantages to him by way of an increased price growing out of other provisions of the bill on that part of the cotton which must be exported. There is no enhancement in price for the rest of the crop by reason of land rentals or reduction in production, thereby decreasing the surplus. There is no advantage by reason of benefits paid under the allotment plan, if it shall be put into operation, but merely a requirement that for 5,000,000 bales of that crop the buyer must pay the cost of production. For the purpose of this argument we will assume that the cost of production is higher than the standard fixed in this bill on a pre-war basis; but whether higher or lower—and if it is not higher it serves no purpose whatever—how much cotton will the cotton farmer sell next year? Not a bale, not a single pound of cotton for American consumption under the cost-of-production plan will he sell, because the cotton-mill people will go to warehouses and get their cotton. They can buy it from them, I understand, but not from the producer. Certainly the producer will sell no cotton next year.

What about the second year? Mr. President, we have in this country enough cotton for practically 2 years' use, exempt from this proposed cost-of-production limitation upon the buyer. So that for another year, the second year, there would be no advantage of any sort under this plan to the cotton grower.

What about wheat, let me ask you Senators from the wheat section? There is a carry-over of 350,000,000 bushels of wheat; the average domestic consumption is 500,000,000 bushels. That is the quantity for which the buyer would be required to pay the cost of production. Before a wheat grower could sell a bushel of wheat under this plan, the 350,000,000 bushels of wheat in the warehouses, exempt from the plan, must have been bought and consumed, thereby leaving a sale from next year's crop of only 150,000,000 bushels of wheat out of a probable crop of 700,000,000 bushels. So I submit that, while the cost-of-production plan, especially if there could be added to it proper provisions which would elevate the standard of living of the farmer and would give him a good, fair margin—would represent a splendid and ideal theory, and I should like to see it put into execution as much as any man upon this floor of the Senate, yet, from the lights before me, I cannot see how it can operate in any way to the advantage of the farmer, either this year or next year in the case of cotton, and certainly not for this year in the case of wheat.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that this provision really ought to be left out of the bill. There is the question of the uncertainty about buying commodities. If a prospective purchaser does not know whether the producer has sold his domestic allotment of hogs, for instance, he is always under an uncertainty, under an anxiety, about violating the law. If he buys a hog from his neighbor or from the butcher or in the market place, the buyer has got to take the risk of ascertaining the facts for himself as to anything he buys that is included in this bill as a basic commodity.

If the farmer goes to the cotton buyer with cotton or goes to a cotton mill with cotton, what will the buyer ask? "How much is your domestic allotment for this year? How much have you already sold?" And evidence satisfactory to the buyer upon that subject must be presented. Otherwise the purchaser buys at the risk of a substantial fine. I submit that when Senators talk about the uncertainty as to different grades growing out of changes in the amount of the excise tax, and that little uncertainty constitutes a factor serious enough to take nearly an entire day's time of the Senate, it is infinitesimal compared with the investigation that every buyer of any basic commodity must make in order to be sure when he enters into a contract, such as the Constitution authorizes him to make, that in doing so he is not buying some portion of a farmer's production which is not exempted from the domestic allotment allowed him.

It seems to me it will bring about all sorts of uncertainties, all sorts of confusion in the trade, and will retard trade. A situation of that sort is not helpful; and why create it if it is not necessary in order to raise the price of the farmer as high at least as it can be raised under other provisions of the bill to the price which gives a fair exchange value to the farmer for the things that he must buy? So I submit, Mr. President, in view of these suggestions, that this provision ought to be eliminated from the bill. I have heard of no one who advocates it.

I know that the suggestion of the cost of production is a worthy one. I fully agree with the theory. I know that those who propose it, like myself, want to go further than the cost of production; and if we accept the figures of our Government, if we use the facts within our knowledge about the cost of things that enter into the actual production, we must know that this formula cannot give the farmer what he ought to have. If the application of it does not help him, if the Secretary's construction of the application of it does not help the farmer, then why should we insist upon putting a doubtful provision in the bill which at some time, in the hands of some unfriendly Secretary of Agriculture, might result, not in advantage to the farmer, but in reduction of the disparity of the purchasing price down to the cost of actual production as is authorized here?

Mr. President, for these reasons, I hope the Senate will not adopt the amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, we have from time to time during the consideration of the bill dealt in a good deal of "horseplay." We have attempted to ridicule the name bequeathed to a man who happens to hold an official position. We have tried to ridicule the measure out of the Senate because in the province of Almighty God there was handed down from one generation to another a name that someone here does not like. So far as I am concerned, I do not propose to allow my vote as a Member of the Senate to be swayed by any such trivial consideration. I have tried from the beginning of the consideration of the whole farm problem to look upon it and deal with it seriously. I have tried as best I could to picture the causes which have produced the farm situation which calls for legislation. I have tried as best I could to fathom the almost unfathomable problem of how by legislation we could lift the farmer out of the ditch in which he finds himself. We cannot do it by hilarity. We cannot do it by "horseplay." We cannot do it by playing on the name of some man. Neither can we do it by attempting to resort to the criminal law in our efforts to handicap the sale of farm products or to handicap the voluntary exchange of farm products in the markets of the world.

I do not know, and I dare say none of us here knows, whether the bill will solve the problem of the farmer. We considered the McNary-Haugen plan. We did not succeed in getting it enacted into law. We considered the equalization-fee plan, and we could not get that enacted into law. We tried the agricultural stabilization plan under the administration of Mr. Hoover. Notwithstanding the fact that that law operated in some respects beneficially, notwithstanding the fact that the Farm Board in some of its activities, especially in dealing with farm organizations and the encouragement of cooperative agricultural associations, rendered some very large benefit to the farmers of the country, on the whole the plan failed and the farmer was not substantially benefited by it.

I do not know that anybody in the United States is in possession of that amount of wisdom which will enable him to say that he has the last word on the subject of agricultural relief. Certainly I do not possess that wisdom. I know of no Member of this body who possesses it. I know of no Member of the other body of Congress who possesses it. I know of nobody in the United States or any combination of men in the United States who can say beyond peradventure of doubt that they know what may be the real remedy for the farmer's troubles. Therefore I do not know that the bill now under consideration is a solution for the farm problem. I do not understand that it is presented here either by the Secretary of Agriculture or by the President of the United States or by the Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry or by the committee as a whole as a solution of the farm problem which can be handed to the farmers without any hesitation and without any doubt as to its workability.

The truth is that when it was sent down here, if it were sent, in its original form from the Department of Agriculture, following a message from the President, he announced that he did not know that it was the last word in agricultural relief, that it was untrodden ground. The ground we have covered has been untrodden ground, except the ground which we have trod in some of our laws which have had a good deal to do with keeping this burden on agriculture, has been trodden over and over again at the behest of certain groups of people in the United States who have always preyed upon agriculture and used the title of "the farmer" as a smoke screen behind which to secure legislative favors of its own in the form of tariff or tax laws enacted by the Congress of the United States.

We need not delude ourselves in the belief that this particular measure is going to do all that its authors or sponsors may hope that it will do, but I am going to vote for it in the belief that it is no worse than any others that have been brought forward in the past by the Senate, and it may be infinitely better, because it does fix responsibility upon somebody to deal in an official capacity with the troubles of agriculture and use the powers that are granted in the bill in an effort to remedy the condition of the farmer. Certainly we can do nothing to make that condition worse, and we may be able to do something that will make it better.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I notice the Senator mentions in a rather derogatory manner the tariff. This bill extols the tariff feature very much, and finds it necessary in order to aid agriculture that we invoke the tariff. In other words, the Senator will be in line with us tariff people when he votes for the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not think I will be in line with "us tariff people" if the Senator from Louisiana classes himself among "us tariff people." If the Senator from Louisiana classes himself with the Fordneys, the McCumbers, the Smoots, and the Hawleys as being "us tariff people", then I take myself out of that class.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Louisiana does not class himself with the Smoots, the Hawleys, the Fordneys, and the McCumbers. The Senator from Louisiana classes himself with the Washingtons, the Lincolns, and the Jeffersons on the tariff. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. I am sorry I cannot consult them and ascertain their reaction to the last statement of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. It will be no trouble to find how they stood.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not care to get into a tariff argument with the Senator from Louisiana or anybody else. So far as the tariff provisions of the bill are concerned, they represent merely an effort to put the farmer upon a parity with others who have enjoyed the tariff. That is no justification for the tariffs that have been heaped upon the farmer's back. That is no justification for the policy of iniquity, as I believe, which has worked the undoing of the farmer; but in view of the fact that the tariffs are on his back and that he must submit to them and live under them, then there is nothing unfair or inconsistent in an effort to make the farmer equal to those who have enjoyed them for a century, and that is all the bill undertakes to do. The fact that they are in the bill affords no reason whatever to criticize it or vote against it.

Mr. LONG. I agree with the Senator in all he has said. That is why we people who are raising sugar are entitled to just as much tariff as the man who is raising cotton or wheat. We cannot live without it. We have to trade in and buy on the tariff market.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, as I was trying to say when interrupted so pleasantly by the Senator from Louisiana—and I welcome all his interruptions and appreciate the Senator's situation, though I do not always approve his reaction to problems; but he and I will not fall out about methods, he will no doubt continue to pursue his and I shall pursue mine.

As I was about to say, unless some Member of the Senate or some Member of the other body of the Congress can offer a better solution for the problems of agriculture, can bring in here in clear understandable English a better bill than the one we have before us now, it does not lie in our mouths to criticize what somebody else has tried to work out. Unless I can in the quietude of my study, as a result of investigation, write a better bill than this and bring it in here and offer it as a substitute, I have no moral right to find fault with and criticize what somebody else has done, or to try to ridicule it out of the Senate of the United States.

We have the farm problem to deal with and we are compelled to deal with it. For years we have been trying to find a market for farm products. We have been complaining, in the last 3 or 4 years especially, because of artificial trade barriers erected by the nations of the world against international trade, a process which we ourselves inaugurated when we passed the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill in 1929 and thereby set an example for retaliation around the world, thereby set an example for the raising of artificial barriers which have reduced international trade in 3 years by more than 50 percent and reduced world trade last year by more than 24 percent. We must deal, therefore, with the question of surplus products of the farm because our own example and our own legislative processes have destroyed the markets of the world for the American farmer.

During the last 3 or 4 years we have been seeking some way to find a market for the products of the farmer. We have complained that our wheat has been piled up in the granaries, that our corn has been piled up in the corn bins, that our tobacco has been piled up in the tobacco barns and in warehouses, and that all other products of the farm have been frozen because of the inability of the farmer to sell and the inability of the purchaser to buy, and because of their inability to scale the walls of artificial trade restrictions that have been erected between the nations of the world so as to stagnate world business. There never has been and there never will be an era of prosperity, either to the farmer or to the manufacturer or to the laboring man or to the business man, until there has been a resumption of world trade in all of the exchangeable commodities that are produced in the world; yet in this very measure we have a provision that puts another handicap upon sale, that erects another artificial barrier against exchange; and we have gone to the extent of resorting to the criminal law to make it an offense for a man to buy any part of any commodity at a price lower than the Secretary of Agriculture in Washington shall have proclaimed as the cost of producing that product.

What is a basic agricultural product as contemplated in this bill?

Section 11, on page 16, says:

> As used in this title, the term "basic agricultural commodity" means wheat, cotton, field corn, hogs, rice, tobacco, and milk.

Keep those basic commodities in mind for just a moment.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. May I suggest that it says more than that. It says "and its products."

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; any product of the things named.

Mr. COUZENS. That includes butter and numerous other products.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; butter, cheese, and it might include canned corn; it might include cigarettes; it might include smoking tobacco and chewing tobacco; it might even include bread, because bread is a product of wheat. There is no limitation to the number of products covered in that definition of "basic agricultural commodity."

In the section under discussion at this time we have this provision. We must read the two together in order to understand the effect:

> The Secretary of Agriculture, in addition to the powers granted by parts 2 and 3 of this title, is hereby authorized, with respect to any basic agricultural commodity—

It is with respect to any of these things that I read back in section 11—> to estimate as nearly as practicable and proclaim from time to time—

> (1) The percentage of the domestic production of the commodity, including carry-over stocks for market during the next marketing period for the commodity, that will be needed for domestic consumption.

In other words, let us assume that a billion bushels of corn are produced in the United States in 1933. At some indefinite time, and from time to time, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make a proclamation announcing how much of that billion bushels of corn will be consumed in the United States and how much of it, in all probability, will be exported to other countries. He is authorized at the same time to proclaim the average cost of producing that billion bushels of corn—not a certain price in Kentucky, not another price in Missouri, not another one in Iowa or Minnesota, but an average cost of production for the United States of all the 1,000,000,000 bushels of corn produced in 1933 and the proportion of that billion bushels of corn that will be consumed in the United States.

Let us assume that the Secretary of Agriculture proclaims that 600,000,000 bushels of that corn will be consumed in the United States, and that the average cost of producing that corn has been 20 cents a bushel. Then it will be unlawful for anybody anywhere to buy any portion of that billion bushels of corn for less than 20 cents a bushel. Although the farmer may be willing to sell it for 15 cents a bushel; although his taxes, his debts, his children, his wife may need the amount of money that will be obtained by a sale at 15 cents a bushel; although there may be a mortgage suspended over that farm and there may be foreclosure proceedings to sell it from over his head, yet nobody can buy a single bushel of that corn for 15 cents a bushel without subjecting himself to a penalty of a year in prison or a fine of $1,000!

Let us take, for instance, tobacco. I have in my hand a pamphlet issued by the Department of Agriculture—Circular No. 249, issued in January 1933, on American Tobacco, Types and Uses and Markets, prepared by Dr. Charles E. Gage, senior marketing specialist in charge of the tobacco section, Bureau of Agricultural Economics. Within the pages of this little pamphlet there are 62 types of tobacco described, all of them grown under separate and different circumstances, all of them produced according to climate and soil, most of them with a different use, most of them with a different market.

It would be utterly impossible for the Secretary of Agriculture or a congregation of Secretaries of Agriculture to proclaim any average price for those 62 types of tobacco that would be fair to any single one of them, because not only are they produced in different sections of the country, in different types of soil, used for different purposes, and sold in different parts of the world, but the price likewise varies as much as the character of the soil or the type of tobacco. So the Secretary of Agriculture could not proclaim a general average as the cost of producing tobacco in the United States that would be a fair average for any particular crop, and I take it for granted that he could not take all 62 types and investigate with sufficient detail to proclaim a fair estimate of the cost of production for all 62 of these types. Yet if he proclaims an average price for all the tobacco grown in the United States, which average might be higher than is ever brought by certain types of tobacco, no farmer in Virginia or Kentucky or North or South Carolina or Ohio or Wisconsin or Pennsylvania or Connecticut could sell a single load of that tobacco at less than the average price proclaimed by the Secretary of Agriculture, because nobody would be willing to undergo the chances of being indicted in a Federal court for buying tobacco at a price lower than the average cost of production fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do.

Mr. ADAMS. I should like to have the Senator from Kentucky give us his view of the constitutionality of the provision he is discussing, if it is within the intent of his discussion.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate the compliment paid me by the Senator from Colorado. I do not know that my opinion of its constitutionality would be any more valuable than any other opinion; but, if I have time, I will touch on that phase of the matter before I conclude.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to his colleague?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to have the Senator or someone tell me what is meant by "cost of production"; that is, what elements would be taken into consideration in determining the cost of production. I cannot understand the argument made by my learned colleague or by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who just preceded him, unless I first know what is meant by "cost of production." Then I can follow the argument much better.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to my colleague that I have no formula; and if my colleague heard read from the desk a while ago the statement or letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, he will recall that the Secretary of Agriculture makes the contention that it is impossible for him or anybody else to formulate a formula by which the cost of production of agricultural products can be ascertained to such a nicety as to justify him in proclaiming it as the price below which nobody can sell and nobody can buy the product upon which he proclaims what is the cost of production. I frankly say that I do not know myself how a formula can be arrived at covering all the agricultural products and all the types of any commodity, and the products that are produced from the raw material, that can justify any Secretary of Agriculture in proclaiming any figure as the absolute cost of production to be used in guiding the farmer in selling his commodity, or the purchaser in buying it.

Mr. LOGAN. I think it is absolutely impossible.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree with my colleague. It is so utterly impossible that it seems almost incongruous that when we have been for years trying to find a market for the surplus products of the farmer, now we are going to invoke the criminal law and impose a penalty upon anybody who buys any farm product unless he buys it at or above the price which has been designated by the Secretary of Agriculture as the cost of production.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the Senator that the Department of Agriculture has for years done the very thing that Senators say is impossible, and the Congress of the United States has been appropriating millions of dollars to enable the Department of Agriculture to do it. The Department has issued statements from time to time saying that the cost of production of wheat is such and such a figure.

My idea about the matter is this, if the Senator will pardon me: I agree that it is an extremely difficult thing to find out what the cost of production is on this piece of land and that piece of land; but the Department from time to time has said what the cost of production is. While I am going to support this bill, I say to the Senator that it is going to be an extremely difficult thing for the Agricultural Department or for any department of the Government of the United States to find out what the base price was between 1909 and 1914, and then to apply that base price to a figure in 1933, because there will be a continual fluctuation between the cost of production of wheat in 1905 and 1914 and 1933 and 1934, and the cost of production of wheat is going to vary from time to time. I frankly say to you, however, that I do not think it would be any more difficult for the Department of Agriculture to find the cost of production than it will be to find these other figures which they propose to make.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Was the Senator from Montana here when the statement of the Secretary was read?

Mr. WHEELER. I did not hear the statement.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Did the Senator get the fact that, according to the formula that has been referred to by the Senator, used by the Department of Agriculture, the cost of production of wheat is now 60 cents a bushel, and the cost of production of cotton is 8 cents a pound?

Mr. WHEELER. I did not hear that statement; but let me call attention to this fact: I do not know what formula the Department of Agriculture went on, and I do not know what formula it has taken. I heard the Secretary of Agriculture, or somebody, make the statement before the Agricultural Committee that if we took the cost of production as figured by the Department of Agriculture, it would be lower than the figures of the cost of production of wheat based upon the base price between 1909 and 1914; but on the one hand we are told that we cannot find the cost of production, and on the other hand we are told by the Department of Agriculture what the cost of production is, based upon certain formulas.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Secretary's letter, as I understood it, set forth that there was a variation in the estimation of the cost of producing wheat ranging all the way from 40 cents a bushel to $1.50 a bushel; and I understood that under certain formulas adopted by the Department of Agriculture, 81 cents had been arrived at as probably a fair average cost of production of wheat.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No, Mr. President; the Senator is mistaken about that. It was 60 cents.

Mr. BARKLEY. He mentioned 81 cents in that connection. Perhaps I got the relationship wrong; but let us assume that the cost of producing wheat in 1932 was 60 cents a bushel. Let us assume that it was 50 cents or 40 cents. We know that the farmers in the wheat fields of Kansas, Iowa, Missouri, and Kentucky sold their wheat for as low as 25 cents a bushel. Let us suppose that the Secretary of Agriculture, operating under this section, had issued a proclamation that out of 800,000,000 bushels of wheat grown in this country 600,000,000 were necessary for domestic consumption, and a farmer loaded his wagon with wheat at the thresher and took his wheat into the market and undertook to sell it for anything less than 40, or 50, or 60 cents—whatever figure may have been proclaimed by the Secretary of Agriculture. Does anybody suppose he would have had a sale for it? Would any wheat buyer buy it with that law staring him in the face, when, if he is taken into a Federal court, the only defense he has is that he did not buy any wheat? Regardless of the circumstances, if he bought the wheat from the farmer at 30 or 35 or 39 cents a bushel, although the farmer was there begging him to buy it because he needed the money, if he bought wheat at less than the price fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture the grand jury would indict him, and we know he would go to the penitentiary or pay a fine of a thousand dollars.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I would like to know whether, in considering the cost of production, interest on the investment is to be considered; and if so, whether it is on the value of the farm at the present time or the purchase price of the farm; whether depletion and depreciation are to be considered; whether we are to include the work of the man's family and his own children, men and women and boys and girls. I would like to know how we reach a standard of cost of production. I have seen that statement, as suggested by the Senator from Montana, given out by the Department of Agriculture, but I do not know whether it is correct or not, because I do not know the different units which go to make it up. I am going to vote for the bill, but it is not because I know very much about it but because, as suggested a while ago, I do not know any better plan than has been offered. Therefore I am going to vote for this one.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the Senator will understand that we are considering a section now put into the bill by the committee as an amendment, a section which was not in the original bill. Answering my colleague, I would assume that any fair estimate of the cost of production would take into consideration the value of the land, or its cost, interest on the investment, and the value of the labor of every human being that went into the production of the crop, whether it was the man, or his wife, or his children, because, assuming that their time is valuable—and it is unfair to assume anything else—we would have to estimate the value of their services to see what would be the cost of hiring similar services in order to produce the crop.

I cannot understand that the Secretary of Agriculture, or anybody else, in estimating the cost of production, would take into consideration the fact that a man owned the land already, that he and his wife and his whole family raised the crop, and did not pay out any money whatever for help; therefore that there was no cost of production. Certainly that would not be a fair criterion by which to proceed. We must first estimate the value of every man's services that went into the production of the crop and all the elements that go into the production of it, the ownership of the land, the taxes, all of which factors complicate the problem when we undertake to arrive at a cost of production for crops which have many different types.

We may assume some farmer in one section or another section of the country who raises his tobacco crop of 10 acres only by the labor of himself and his family. We may assume there was no cash outlay whatever. He might be able to say that the cost of producing that crop was 3 cents a pound. But the Secretary of Agriculture has proclaimed that it takes 10 cents a pound to produce an average crop of tobacco, and I dare say that that man never would find a market for that 10-acre crop of tobacco, because nobody would buy it.

Mr. LOGAN. Suppose a cropper or a tenant of the man, who gets a part of the crop for the cultivation, does not own anything, does not furnish the team, or the hay for old Dobbin, or any of those things; then his part of the cost of production would be one thing and the farmer's part would be another.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. We would have to use a different basis in arriving at the cost of production for that sort of a farmer.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Different methods have been employed by various agencies for ascertaining cost of production, but practically all methods recognize among other elements the cost of the land, the labor that enters into the preparation of the land, the cultivation of the crop, the harvesting of it, the marketing of it, the cost of the seed, and the cost of the fertilizer, if any be used.

Mr. BARKLEY. The cost of the machinery.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Not the cost of the machinery but a reasonable value of the use of the machinery.

Mr. BARKLEY. The cost of it spread out over the term for which it would be useful.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes. Most methods recognize the tax element as a fair one to be considered in making up the cost of production. Ascertainment of cost of production is more or less a scientific process, and there is general concurrence as to the items which enter into it.

The significant fact, though, with respect to the paragraph of which the Senator is speaking, is that it is easily demonstrable that the cost of production, if adopted as the method of farm relief, under this bill, would result in less benefits than the fair exchange value, for the reason, principally, that costs of production now are at the minimum. While all farm commodity prices are low, all the costs of production are exceedingly low, and the result is that if we ascertain a fair cost of production in accordance with the facts applicable at this time, we get the lowest standard that could be obtained within perhaps the lifetime of anyone who is attending these proceedings.

Mr. President, I doubt very much whether the figures contained in the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture are as low as the facts would warrant. I doubt whether an ascertainment of the cost of production of cotton would show it to be 8 cents a pound, and I am morally sure that the cost of production of wheat would not exceed 60 cents a pound.

When we take into consideration the fact that the cost-of-production benefits apply only to that part of the commodity which is held for domestic consumption—and in the case of cotton I believe that is about 40 or 45 percent—we will find that the cost of production, if estimated at 8 cents a pound, would net the producer a much lower figure than 8 cents per pound on the whole crop. In other words, we would have to take into consideration the 60 percent or the 55 percent, whichever figure may be correct, in arriving at the amount of benefit which the farmer would actually receive; and, if we proceed on this cost-of-production basis, we will accomplish practically nothing insofar as some of the commodities included in the bill are concerned.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, we must keep in mind the difference between the process intended by this section and the process by which the previous section is to be worked out, so far as parity is concerned.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, yes; I am not speaking of the fair exchange value; I am speaking now of the cost-of-production plan.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is undoubtedly right, because, if we take the present cost of production as the basis for any proclamation which might be issued by the Secretary of Agriculture, it will be unfair as to all commodities covered in this amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that I appreciate very much that this particular part of the bill, part 3, has defects in it, but I hope the Senator will not force me to point out the defects with reference to some of the other phases of the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator that I am not engaged now in a comparison of defects. I am trying to engage in a comparison of benefits. We can find defects in all the legislation we pass here.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course. For instance, I have not the slightest doubt that the leasing plan provided in this bill would not apply to wheat in my section of the country. I do not think there is a chance for it to operate successfully as to wheat in my section of the country.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is referring to the leasing plan?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes. I am extremely doubtful as to whether or not the farmers in my section would get any benefit out of the allotment plan because of the fact that it is so complicated and is going to require so much governmental control.

The wheat farmers in my section of the country have come to the Congress of the United States, through the largest farm organization in the United States, representing more farmers in my section than any and all of the other organizations put together, and they have asked that this plan be put into the bill. It was reported out by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The Secretary of Agriculture would not have to put it into operation unless he wanted to put it into operation. He will not put it into operation on tobacco if it will not work. He will not put it into operation, I assume, on cotton if it will not work.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, let me interrupt the Senator there. Does he construe this provision to mean that there is any option about what commodities would be put in under it?

Mr. WHEELER. Without a question of a doubt I think there is.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It does not give any option at all. If it applies to any, it applies to all of them.

Mr. BARKLEY. The language is that the Secretary is authorized to apply this yardstick to any basic agricultural commodity, and the definition of a basic agricultural commodity is set out in the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not interpret that to mean that the Secretary has to apply it to all of them. He may apply it to any one of them or any number of them.

Mr. WHEELER. That is my understanding, that he can apply it to any one or all of them. The same thing is true with reference to the leasing plan. He can apply it to one or to all. He can apply the leasing plan, as a matter of fact, to certain territory with reference to wheat, or he can apply the allotment plan with reference to wheat in another section, or he can apply this plan to wheat in another section. Why the Secretary of Agriculture, why any administration, why anybody would want to say that we do not want this in the bill, even though we are not going to make it operate, I cannot understand. The farmers in my section of the country are overwhelmingly in favor of this particular section of the bill. If the tobacco growers did not want it, if the cotton growers did not want it, that, it seems to me, would be up to them.

I want to say this to the Senator: I do not know whether it is constitutional or not, but I have serious doubts as to whether or not the other provision of the bill, with reference to the allotment plan, is constitutional. I have serious doubt in my mind as to whether or not the Department of Agriculture can go out and put a tax upon some of these things which it is proposed it shall put the tax on. But I take the position that I am going to vote for the bill because of the fact that we have been fighting for agriculture here for 10 years, we have offered plans and they have been turned down, and consequently I am perfectly willing to experiment with this bill. But I do think that when the farmers of my section of the country, of the Northwest section, and of the country generally, have spoken as they have spoken, through their recognized organizations, representing more farmers, I repeat, in Montana, North and South Dakota, Minnesota, Iowa, and other sections, than any and all the rest of the farm organizations of the country, they ought to be given some consideration when this bill is being passed through the Congress of the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to say that I have great respect for the wheat growers not only of the Senator's State but of the Northwest generally, and I have great respect for any wheat grower. As a boy I was almost reared in a wheat field, and I have done everything in connection with the production of wheat from the fallowing of the soil to the threshing of the wheat, to hauling it to market, to grinding it into flour. I have worked at almost every job that has anything to do with wheat, from the time it is produced until it is consumed. But, without regard to the source of any request for this or any other section of this bill, I feel it my duty, as a legislator, to inquire into its workability and its practicability and its soundness; and to inquire whether, admitting it may be beneficial if put into operation in some sections, it would work an injustice to farmers in other sections of the country who may not have come here en masse, if we include a criminal provision penalizing somebody who bought something from them at a price upon which they might agree.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that, so far as I am concerned, I think the penal provision under which a man may be sent to the penitentiary or sent to jail should be taken out of the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is the only way that sort of a provision can be enforced.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator, with reference to the allotment plan, that there are provisions in the bill to the effect that the Secretary of Agriculture may make rules and regulations; when he makes such rules and regulations they have the force and effect of law, and an offender can be prosecuted and sent to the penitentiary not only for a violation of the provisions of the law but he can be sent to the penitentiary for 3 years for a conspiracy to violate the rules and regulations made by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Department of Agriculture cannot go beyond the yardstick set down in the act itself in fixing those regulations, and that yardstick is the average cost not of the products but the average price to the farmer between the years 1909 and 1914—that is easy to ascertain—taken in relationship to the purchasing power of the farmer over the same period with respect to that commodity. All the regulations of the Department revolve around that very thing.

Mr. WHEELER. I beg to differ with the Senator. The Department has the right under this bill to fix the tax so that it can regulate the price at any point the Secretary of Agriculture wants it regulated.

Mr. BARKLEY. But the tax can never be greater than the difference between the average parity price for the 5-year period and the price received by the farmer. It may be less but it cannot be any greater.

Mr. WHEELER. No; it can be greater than that. Let me say to the Senator that under the provisions of this bill, as explained by the chairman of the committee, and if the argument of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is correct, and the statements made before the committee are correct, then if the price of wheat tomorrow should be 50 cents and the Department levied a tax of 44 cents, that would make the parity price 94 cents; but if the next day the price of wheat went up to 60 cents, it would make the price which the people would have to pay $1.04.

Mr. BARKLEY. At any rate, it would always be regulated by the difference between the price obtained by the farmer today and the average parity price over the period from 1909 to 1914.

Mr. WHEELER. That would depend entirely upon whether one takes the construction placed upon it by the Senator from Alabama or the construction placed upon it by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am taking my own construction of it, based upon a reading of the bill itself.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator takes that construction and can tell me from reading the bill how the Department of Agriculture is limited in the way it fixes that tax, then he will do better than anyone who has explained it upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator if there is anything wrong with that provision of the bill, the thing to do is to correct it. I am talking now about the penal provision put in the bill to compel a buyer to pay more than a certain price—a price fixed by the Department of Agriculture—and thereby interfere with the right of contract, the right of sale, by a man who has produced an article and desires to sell it at a certain price that may be less than the price set as the cost of production by the Department of Agriculture. I do not think there is any real relationship between this amendment and the original provisions of the bill with reference to the so-called "allotment plan", because the basis is different.

Mr. WHEELER. The basis is different, but, nevertheless, under the allotment plan the Department can fix the price lower than the cost of production under this bill if it sees fit to do so.

Now, with reference to violations, I do not feel that the law should establish a penalty under which a man may be sent to the penitentiary for a violation of a regulation. Nevertheless, let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture, under the so-called "allotment plan", is permitted to make rules and regulations; we are giving him carte blanche to make rules and regulations. Then let me call attention to the fact that if those rules and regulations are violated, the one violating them can be sent to the penitentiary, and if two men should violate those rules and regulations, those two men can be sent to the penitentiary for conspiracy to violate the rules and regulations laid down by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize that if that is a fault, it is a fault that is found in many statutes on the books of the United States.

Mr. WHEELER. That is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Bureau of Chemistry, for instance, of the Department of Agriculture, has the right to make rules and regulations with respect to enforcement of the Pure Food Act, any violation of which subjects the violator to a penalty either of fine or imprisonment.

Mr. WHEELER. For that reason, while I do not like the provisions to which the Senator refers that gives the power to send a violator to the penitentiary, nevertheless when we are giving the Secretary of Agriculture the power to make rules and regulations and then have upon the statute books a conspiracy statute under which, if a man violates those rules and regulations, which have the effect of law, he can be sent to the penitentiary for 3 years, I do not think we should cry so very much because of the fact that there is a penalty in the bill under which a man may be sentenced to jail because he violates another provision.

Mr. BARKLEY. The rules and regulations to be made under the first part of the bill do not affect anybody's right to sell what is his, what he has produced by his own sweat and his own muscle; they are regulations made for the purpose of enabling the Department to carry out the provisions of the act itself, which revolve around the parity price fixed for a period of years as compared to the purchase price. That is the very heart of the allotment plan and the levying of the tax, which represents the difference between the average price for the 5 years and the price obtained by the farmer, if the price obtained now is lower. Of course, if the price obtained now by the farmer is higher than the average price from 1909 to 1914 there is no tax. It is only in such cases where the farmer sells for less than the price of that average period that there is a tax levied by the Government, which is ultimately intended to go to the farmer so that he may obtain a price at least as high as that represented by the 5-year period from 1909 to 1914. All these regulations are for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the provision with reference to that simple proposition.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I am yielding to the Senator from Montana, but I do not want to consume much more time.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not want to take much time, but I do want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that under the allotment plan the Department will make rules and regulations respecting the sale, as to how the farmer shall sell and how the processor shall buy, and if the Secretary makes a rule and that rule of the Department is violated, then the violator can be sent to jail for violation of that rule laid down by the Department, just the same as he can with reference to the violations of the provisions of this proposed law.

Mr. BARKLEY. I doubt that.

Mr. WHEELER. There can be no question of doubt about it to anybody who is familiar with it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Assuming that to be true——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to ask the Senator how he figures that out under any plan proposed by the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One Senator at a time, please.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask whether I still have the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let me answer the Senator from Montana first and then I will yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

In the first place, as I have said a time or two, the regulations which may be issued and promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture are based upon the fundamental proposition laid down by the law itself. They do not make any new law; they only emphasize the necessity of going into more detail than the Congress can go into in providing the method by which the law itself shall be carried out. There is nothing in the law that would justify a regulation saying to any farmer who produces corn or hogs or wheat or cotton or tobacco or rice or milk that he cannot sell his product to any buyer at any price upon which the two of them may agree. If that commodity has been sold at a price that may be lower than the average price from 1909 to 1914, then there is a tax levied that is in turn paid back to the farmer in order that he may get the average price of 1909 to 1914. This section, however, makes it a criminal offense for one party to an agreement to sell or buy any commodity at a price lower than the cost of production fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Now let us take milk; let us assume, for instance—and milk is in this equation—that the Secretary of Agriculture would proclaim that the average cost of producing a gallon of sweet milk is 30 cents. I do not know whether that is correct or not, but we will take that as an example. Under this section any farmer with one cow, who milks that cow every morning, who takes the milk into town and sells it for home consumption for less than 30 cents a gallon would involve the purchaser of that milk in the possibility of indictment and fine and imprisonment for 1 year for buying a gallon of milk at 25 cents a gallon, when the Secretary of Agriculture has proclaimed that the average cost of producing a gallon of milk is 30 cents. I say that will operate as a handicap for the sale of farm products and not enhance the chances of the farmer to dispose of his surplus. Now I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. If the Senator from Kentucky will yield, and if I may have the attention also of the Senator from Montana, let me say that it seems to me that both Senators who have just spoken have put their finger upon one of the vital defects in this bill. Obviously, the allotment plan cannot work if the only farmers to be restricted in production are those who grew the products last year. It is of no use to arrange a reduction of acreage for those who produced wheat last year if every other farmer is free to go in and plant an unlimited quantity of wheat. So everyone who has thought of that seems to agree that the Secretary must put in force a regulation prohibiting the nonwheat producers of last year from becoming unlimited wheat producers next year, and, as the Senator from Montana has pointed out, a farmer who violates that regulation by planting an acre in wheat may be sent to the penitentiary for a year under this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator put his finger on any place in this bill that gives the Secretary of Agriculture any power to prevent a man from planting his own land.

Mr. REED. It is quite obvious.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think there is anything in the bill from which such an inference can be drawn.

Mr. REED. If the Senator takes that position, then he admits in the beginning that the bill cannot succeed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not admit that at all.

Mr. REED. The Senator must admit it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Regardless of any defects that may exist in the so-called "allotment plan", I admit freely that I recognize the possibility of serious defects; I recognize the possibility of its entire collapse, because it is an experiment; we cannot tell in advance how it will work; but I do not think that such defects as exist in the so-called "allotment plan" compare with the unworkability and almost the atrocity of this provision of the amendment which penalizes the man who is willing to buy something that a farmer has to sell.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more statement from me?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator is exactly right on that point. This bill would make it a penitentiary offense for the mother of a baby to buy a quart of milk for one cent less than the proclaimed cost of production, although she was frantically anxious to have the milk and although the owner of the milk was frantically anxious to sell it.

Mr. BARKLEY. And thereby the farmer might be required to take it back home and see it sour so that it would be unfit for human consumption because he could not sell it to that mother for one cent less than the proclaimed price of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. REED. Exactly. Does the Senator believe that the people of this country generally realize that this bill contains such features as that?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not; as a matter of fact, I did not realize it until the bill had been reported and I had read it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I wish to ask a question to ascertain whether or not I understand the remarks the Senator made some time ago. I may have misunderstood him, but as I understood the Senator he was arguing that one of the purposes of the bill is to raise the price of agricultural products up to the price paid for such products in the period from 1909 to 1914.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; that is in the first title of the bill; that is the provision which fixes the period from 1909 to 1914 as the base period for ascertaining the average price of farm products during that period, in order to bring farm products in the future up to a parity, considering not only the average price but the average purchasing power of the crop during the same period. Of course, that is a different proposition from the one we are discussing here with reference to this amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I realize that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the object of the bill, as we all hope and as it unquestionably is, I believe, is to raise the price of farm products up to the pre-war period. If we limit it only to the average price, it might be out of line with the purchasing power, and they are linked up together. The basis for the tax is not the average price of the commodities for the 5 years as compared with the present price; but the word "parity" is used, which means a correlation of that price together with the amount of stuff that price would buy in 1914. Taking the two equations or—to use the language of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] quoting from the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture—using those two logarithms, we arrive at what would be a parity between the price of products now and in that 5-year period. But that is entirely different from the proposal here.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; I realize that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Here there is an attempt to put it within the power of the Secretary of Agriculture to say what the cost of production of any of these articles is in any year and from time to time. It might be a different cost each year. If anybody buys any of them for less than that cost proclaimed by the Secretary, he incurs liability to a penalty of $1,000 or a year in prison.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator will indulge me further, I realize this is not involved in the question which the Senator is discussing, but he did make a statement in discussing the provision that led me to believe that he thought the price paid for agricultural products from 1909 to 1914 would have something to do with the price to be fixed now.

Mr. BARKLEY. It has.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That has also been said by others, and because of the future interpretation of the law, unless I am in error, I think it very important that we should bear in mind and the RECORD should show that the Congress, in enacting this piece of legislation, did not intend that the price for agricultural products from 1909 to 1914 has anything to do at all with the price that will be fixed under this bill, except as it is used to establish the parity of agricultural products for the purpose of exchange with the dollar of industry during that same period.

Mr. BARKLEY. Standing by themselves the prices for the commodities between 1909 and 1914 have no relation to the object of the bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is right.

Mr. BARKLEY. Standing together with the purchasing power of the money derived from those prices in 1914 and linking the two together, it is the very heart of the bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. Arriving at that parity price to me presents a complicated situation, but there are undoubtedly formulas and scientific bases which aid those who are skilled in that sort of thing in arriving at a parity of price. As a matter of fact, the Department of Agriculture have already figured out for us, who come from the tobacco section of the country, what the parity of price on different types of tobacco will be based on those two equations. That is one of the objects of the passage of the bill.

Mr. President, I have occupied much more time than I intended.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, before the Senator concludes, will he yield briefly to me?

Mr. BARKLEY. Very well.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is not complaining about the allotment section?

Mr. BARKLEY. No.

Mr. CONNALLY. But he is objecting, and he raises the fundamental question that here is a man who produces something and wants to sell it, but the Government says he cannot sell it.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is the objection I have to it, and my contention is that we cannot raise the prices of agricultural products or any other product by making it a penalty for a man to buy them.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I thought I understood the provisions of the bill a great deal better than it seems that I do really understand them. Let me cite a case to the Senator from Kentucky. A woman grinds up a little sausage; a hog is killed and she takes a little sausage mill and grinds up a little sausage. Of course, that is "processing" under the bill, as I understand it. If she went to sell that sausage, she clearly would come within the provisions of the bill, whether the amendment is left in it or not, would she not? She would have to have a permit to sell the sausage and come under the provisions of the bill in order that she might get a fair price.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not think so; but I would like to have the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] answer that question. If I have a hog and kill that hog and take a little strip or two and grind it up into sausage and take that sausage to a grocer and sell it, I do not think I have to pay a tax on it.

Mr. LONG. That is the way I interpreted the bill. I think that the Senator has processed the hog when he kills him, he has processed the hog when he grinds him up, and he has processed the hog when he packs up the sausage.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, if we have to process him every time we touch him, we will soon process him out of existence. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. That is what I am afraid of. We are going to process him to the point where we cannot eat him. Processing is defined in the bill, of course.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is my impression that there is a provision in the bill which requires that a tax shall be levied on the first processing and shall not be levied on any subsequent processing.

Mr. BARKLEY. On page 19, subsection (b) it is provided:

> The Secretary of Agriculture may provide by regulations for exemption from the tax of commodities processed by the producer thereof or processed for the producer.

I do not think the sausage mill would bear a tax.

Mr. LONG. Here it is on page 13. There is a definition at the top of page 13 as follows:

> In the case of hogs, the term "processing" means the slaughter of hogs for market.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And there is only one tax levied.

Mr. LONG. That is the tax about which I am talking. If there were such a thing done as a pig killed, then the woman who kills the pig comes under the terms of the bill. Whether we leave this provision in about which the Senator is talking or not, it is still going to mean there is authority in the Secretary of Agriculture to issue rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. The rules and regulations he would issue, under that section, are rules and regulations exempting from the tax the processing referred to in subsection (b) on page 19.

Mr. LONG. Not necessarily only those exemptions. He can issue whatever rules and regulations are necessary.

Mr. BARKLEY. If he is exempted by the terms of the bill, it would really need no further rule or regulation to exempt him again.

But coming back to the point I am discussing, if the woman killed her hog and ground some of it into sausage and carried that sausage to a grocer and sold it to the grocer for home consumption at a price lower than the average cost proclaimed by the Secretary of Agriculture, that grocer would be subject to imprisonment in the penitentiary or to a fine of $1,000. I submit that no grocer would buy sausage under those circumstances.

Mr. LONG. I understand, but the point I am worrying about is this: We have a provision that competing agricultural products will be subject to the provisions of the bill. We will finally get up to where potatoes will compete with rice. Then the peeling of potatoes will be processing.

Mr. BARKLEY. It might be by a professional potato peeler, but not by the grower of potatoes.

Mr. LONG. I do not know who a professional potato peeler would be.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suppose it might be in an institution that engages in peeling potatoes.

Mr. LONG. Then we will get to peanuts——

Mr. BARKLEY. Peanuts will be brought up later by the Senator from Virginia, and I do not want to get into that subject now.

Mr. LONG. Then the cracking of the hull on a peanut will be processing.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let us wait until we get to that subject at a later time.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I have taken much more time than I intended because of interruptions. I want to quit, but I will yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. My question is in a serious vein.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am glad to have one in that vein.

Mr. FESS. The Senator mentioned the case of a farmer making sausage. His butchering was for himself, but he sold his sausage. Would not that under the bill classify as processing, because it would be the product of the hog? Although the bill says processing in reference to hogs is the slaughtering for market, but in this case would not this be for the market?

Mr. BARKLEY. I doubt whether it would be within the meaning of this language. Of course, we cannot be technical about the use of the term "first process", or first actual operation, which might mean the shooting of the hog or knocking him in the head with an ax or dipping him in scalding water in order to scrape the hair off. I do not think all these different steps in preparing the hog for marketing constitute processing within the meaning of the bill or would require a tax. I think the way a farmer might treat a hog, whether it was made into sausage or cut into hams and shoulders and various sections of the hog in a manner which might be desirable by the consumer, would be such a processing as would require a tax.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, for information on this point let me say that the question was fully considered in the committee as to the effect upon local killing of hogs and marketing them. The Senator from Nebraska and I, in this connection, worked out and there will be found in section 9 this provision:

> The Secretary of Agriculture may provide by regulations for exemption from the tax of commodities processed by the producer thereof or processed for the producer.

That is intended to give the administration power to make regulations to take care of these small things growing out of the killing of hogs by the raiser of the hogs.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was about to invite the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] to what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has just read. I think that covers the point. I want to offer a similar amendment to the particular committee amendment that is pending which I think will clarify and meet the objections that have been made by several Senators.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, before the Senator offers his amendment let me say that I am not yet clear about it, but the bill is intended to exempt the farmer who butchers for himself.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Or for some neighbor.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The question with me was that the bill takes in the term "product." Sausage would be a product of the hog. Would a farmer who is making sausage to sell at the store be exempted?

Mr. NORRIS. I think the provision authorizing exemptions under regulations to be issued by the Secretary will meet that situation.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will allow me——

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. There was no particular language limiting the home-consumption idea. After the committee had considered it at length, they agreed that wherever a farmer processed his product himself he should not be limited, or where he got someone to process it for him. To illustrate, a farmer carrying his corn to the gristmill and having it converted into meal would not pay a tax; neither would there be a license required by the mill that processed it for his consumption. That was not in the first bill; the Senator from Nebraska brought it up. They finally agreed upon this language—I think the Senator from Nebraska drew this wording—

The Secretary of Agriculture may provide by regulations for exemption from the tax of commodities processed by the producer thereof or processed for the producer.

I admit that it is pretty broad, but it is in the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all within the regulations.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; that is all within the regulations.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, the Secretary could provide that it should not apply to a man who owned a million hogs, or a thousand hogs, and processed them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, does the Senator from Nebraska want to present an amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. I want to offer an amendment when the Senator from Kentucky has finished.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have said all that I care to say about this amendment. As I have already said, I think it will operate to retard the sale of farm products. I think it will operate to create undue fear on the part of the purchasers of farm products, and will work a real hardship to the farmers. For that reason I shall vote for its rejection, and I hope the Senate will not agree to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment similar to the one that appears in this part of the bill. My own idea was that that amendment would apply here.

Of course, there is not anybody on the committee or elsewhere, in my judgment, who wants to make this bill ridiculous. We do not want to get a ridiculous proposition into the law. If a farmer makes some sausage and takes it to town and sells it, nobody wants to compel him to take out a license or to pay a tax. That would make the bill ridiculous. It is not conceived that the bill is going to be administered by anybody who is insane but that the administrator of the bill is in good faith going to try to carry out the real purpose and intention of it.

In the case of the particular amendment that is pending—the committee amendment known as "Part 3", headed "Cost of production"—objections have been made; and I concede that many of these objections would be valid if the idea were to be carried clear down to the point to which it has been carried in the discussion.

For instance, the Senator from Kentucky said yesterday that under this provision, if one farmer sold another one a plug of tobacco, he would have to take out a license. Nobody wants to do that. That would make the bill ridiculous. Nobody wants such a tax; and in order to avoid any possibility of any such ridiculous thing being done, I desire to offer an amendment, on page 26, after line 3, to the part of section 20 which provides for the issuing of the proclamation by the Secretary of Agriculture putting any basic farm product that he wants to under this particular title. I offer this amendment:

Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, in his proclamation, may make such limitations and exceptions as to sales of the basic product as he may deem advisable in order to properly carry out the provisions of this section.

I do not think there will be any possible objection to that amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Where does that come in?

Mr. NORRIS. That comes in on page 26, after line 3.

Mr. BARKLEY. While I am on my feet I will say to the Senator that I do not think there is any objection to that, but I do not think it cures the fundamental difficulty.

Mr. NORRIS. If it does not, let us get an amendment that will.

Mr. President, all that I am trying to do is this: Whether Senators favor this amendment or not is up to them, of course. They must decide that. I shall not find any fault no matter what the decision may be; but in good faith all of us, whether we favor the amendment or not, if we are going to have it, ought to get it in workable shape if possible; and, to my mind, many of the provisions of this bill never can be worked out by writing a statute in advance that will meet all the thousands of conditions that may arise.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator read his proposed amendment again?

Mr. NORRIS. It reads as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, in his proclamation, may make such limitations and exceptions as to sales of the basic product as he may deem advisable in order to properly carry out the provisions of this section.

If that is not broad enough, I should like to make it broader. I should not like, however, to put in an amendment here that would say that the Secretary may make an exception as to sausage, or he may make an exception as to this or that, because when he comes to administer the law he will find that he will be up against all kinds of little, petty, technical, and perhaps well-founded objections to a general law or a general statute, and he will have to make them. I think, under that provision, he could exempt anything he wanted to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, he can do that by never issuing a proclamation at all on anything.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; he does not have to issue a proclamation. He does not have to put this part of the bill into effect at all. I should like to get it in such shape, however, that if, after administering this law, he thinks it is wise to try this provision, he will be able to do it, and do it in a sensible, workmanlike way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator please send his amendment to the desk?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Louisiana oppose the amendment?

Mr. LONG. No sir; I do not even know what the amendment is.

Mr. NORRIS. If there is no opposition to the amendment, I should like to have it acted upon.

Mr. LONG. I simply wanted to ask whether amendments can be offered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment is open to amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to offer another one right after this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Nebraska proposes, on page 26, line 3, after the word "Agriculture", to insert:

Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, in his proclamation, may make such exceptions and limitations as to sales of the basic product as he may deem advisable in order to properly carry out the provisions of this section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to offer another amendment, near the same provision, if I can retain the floor and do that.

A great deal of criticism has been made about the severity of the penalty. As I said before, I do not think any member of the committee desires to have any penalty that is unreasonably severe. It should be just as lenient as possible and still have enough effect and force so that the Secretary can properly enforce the law.

This penalty as written in the amendment is:

Any person violating the provisions of subsection (b)—

That is the one to which this amendment is offered—

Any person violating the provisions of subsection (b) shall, upon conviction thereof, be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both, for each such violation.

On page 26, after the numerals "$1,000", in line 6, I move to strike out the words "or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both, for each such violation", so that if the amendment is agreed to the penalty provided will be this:

shall, upon conviction thereof, be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000.

It might be 1 cent and all the way up to $1,000.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska if the last clause, "for each such violation", should not be left in the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. I think it should. I thank the Senator for that suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state his amendment as modified?

Mr. NORRIS. I correct it, Mr. President. I struck out a little too much, and I am glad the Senator from North Dakota called my attention to it.

On page 26, line 6, after the numerals "$1,000", I move to strike out "or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both."

If the amendment is agreed to, the paragraph will then read as follows:

Any person violating the provisions of subsection (b) shall, upon conviction thereof, be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000 for each such violation.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. McGILL. Just a moment. The way the Senator has drawn his amendment it would still leave the language so that failure to comply literally with the statute would constitute a criminal offense.

I am wondering if the Senator would not be willing to draft his amendment so as to strike out the words "upon conviction thereof" and the word "fine" and insert the word "penalty" instead of the word "fine" and leave the amount $1,000——

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to that. I think that would be sufficiently severe to bring about the enforcement of the act.

Mr. McGILL. And provide that it may be collected by appropriate action brought in the name of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator has that proposition in writing, I should be glad to have it submitted.

Mr. McGILL. I have just drafted an amendment to that effect.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; I withdraw my amendment, and I am willing to accept that language. I think probably that is an improvement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Kansas will send forward his amendment, it will be stated by the clerk.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL] proposes the following modification of the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska:

On page 26, line 5, after the comma following the word "shall", strike out the words "upon conviction thereof", including the comma following the word "thereof."

In the same line, after the word "a", strike out the word "fine" and insert in lieu thereof the word "penalty."

And in line 6, beginning with the word "or", strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert the following:

"Which may be collected by appropriate action in a court of competent jurisdiction, brought in the name of the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. NORRIS. That is all right.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, now may the clerk read the paragraph as proposed to be amended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the paragraph as proposed to be amended. The Chair understands that the Senator from Nebraska accepts the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I can read it. It would read like this, as I understand the amendment:

Any person violating the provisions of subsection (b) shall be subject to a penalty of not more than $1,000 for each such violation—

And then follows the Senator's language, "to be collected in a suit by the Secretary of Agriculture" in substance. Is that right?

Mr. McGILL. That is correct. That is my thought about the matter.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I understand that under that language, then, if a man took 10 bushels of wheat into town and sold it for 30 cents a bushel, when the Secretary of Agriculture had proclaimed that it cost 31 cents, it would be possible to bring a suit for the 10 cents in a court of competent jurisdiction in the name of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. McGILL. It would be competent to bring a suit for $1,000 in the name of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suppose he could bring a suit for a thousand dollars; but if it revolved around a transaction of only 10 bushels of wheat, does the Senator think that any court would render judgment against an innocent purchaser of that wheat when the farmer wanted to sell it to him?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if I still have the floor, I should like to answer the question of the Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. If we are going to enact a law that is effective, there must be a penalty or a fine of some kind to enforce it. I do not know any other way to do it. This particular provision undertakes to do it, if the amendment is agreed to, by assessing a penalty upon the purchaser. That purchaser is going to be licensed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not under this section.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. BARKLEY. No.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt but that he will be licensed. I will admit, however, for the sake of the argument, that he will not be licensed.

Mr. BARKLEY. The fact is that if any person buys any portion of that which is estimated to be——

Mr. NORRIS. Not any person who buys; the penalty is on the purchaser. If we are going to enforce this law, we must punish the purchaser who does not comply with the law. There is no vengeance intended. Nobody wants to injure the purchaser. But there is no escape from it. If we are going to take the cost of production and compel the purchaser—who I think would be licensed, but whether he is or not—to pay the fixed price for the part of the product that is consumed at home, we must provide a penalty for violation of the law.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to call attention to the fact that the same condition exists under the allotment plan, for this reason: Whenever the tax is laid upon any commodity, the individual who sells is not liable, nor is the first purchaser liable, but the processor who accepts that product at any less than the parity price fixed is subject to penalty.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. SMITH. It is just a little further removed, but is inevitable and inflexible.

Mr. NORRIS. If we are to succeed in increasing the price the farmer gets for one of the basic commodities which is to be named in the proclamation, there must be some penalty for a violation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at that point, for I think there must be some misunderstanding about that matter?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the other Senators are right, I am clearly wrong.

I understood the Senator from South Carolina to say, and the Senator from Nebraska to agree with him, that under the allotment plan if a processor pays less than a fixed price he violates the law. My understanding is that there is no restriction upon the processor as to the price he pays. He pays the world price. The application of the allotment plan is that the producer gets a certificate payable from the Treasury in the fall when he harvests his crop, and of course there is no limitation upon the processor, as I understand it. The Government collects the amount from the processor to pay the allotment fee.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. What difference does it make? In that case the Government collects the processing tax, and if the man does not pay it he is penalized.

Mr. BANKHEAD. He has to pay the tax, of course.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the same everywhere. There must be some provision in the proposed law under which the people who disobey it will be penalized. It may be perfectly arbitrary. It seems to me that it does in some respects become arbitrary. But I do not know how there can be any escape from it. There must be a penalty.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Just let me talk a little. There is no inhibition against a man paying more than the tax if he wants to. If the price of wheat goes up above the basic cost-of-production price fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture, anybody can pay it if he wants to; there is no question about that. It can go as high as a man wants to pay for it. But he is required to pay as much as the basic price fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

How are we to provide that the farmer shall receive a price equal to the cost of production? We all talk about it; we all say yes, we want him to have the cost of production; but we are opposed to any law that will give it to him.

Suppose we passed a law and said, "The basic price will be that fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture, but nobody on earth need pay any attention to it if he does not want to." Immediately the world price would control, as it does now.

What is the good of a law? That is one of the things we want to decide. If we think it is wrong to fix the price, of course we do not want the law; but if it is right, how silly we would be to say that it can be disregarded with impunity. If the Secretary of Agriculture fixes the cost price, puts it in his proclamation, with such limitations and exceptions as he wants to put in, and then a purchaser does not pay that price, he ought to be penalized. He does not need to buy if he does not want to, he need not be a purchaser if he does not want to; but if he is in the business of buying, he is required, under the proposed law, to pay at least the cost-of-production price to the producer for that part of his product which the Secretary of Agriculture says is going to be consumed in the United States.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I was first interrupted by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I yield to him.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wanted to ask the Senator this question: Obviously by putting the penalty upon the purchaser we pass a law which may be violated by a hundred percent of the population of the United States, many of whom are extremely unlikely to have actual knowledge of the proclaimed cost of production. The seller is the person who gets all of the benefit from the law, and the sellers constitute only about 40 percent of the population. Why not put the penalty on the person who sells for less than the proclaimed price, instead of on the person who buys the article?

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; perhaps that is the way to handle it. If the Senator thinks that is the way to do it, let him offer an amendment and see how we will vote on it. I am opposed to it myself. That would bring in a lot of complications which we avoid by this provision. I think this is much simpler.

As far as anybody not knowing what the law is is concerned, in the first place, if we want to be technical, the Senator could have his attention called to the fact that ignorance of the law excuses no one. In the next place, there will be no ignorance of the law. When the proclamation is issued applying to wheat, for instance, there will not be a dealer or producer of wheat anywhere in the United States who will not know about it within 5 hours after the proclamation is issued.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. REED. I am not going to offer the amendment until I have received the advice of the Senator about the justice of my suggestion. I was speaking of actual knowledge on the part of the population and not that knowledge which the law presumes. The law presumes that every poor mother in the slums knows the proclaimed cost of production of milk, probably stated in terms of so many cents per hundred pounds. But will the Senator tell me how in the world some poor mother in the slums, who buys a quart of milk at a cost which figures out a cent or a fraction of a cent less than the proclaimed cost, is going to have actual knowledge of it?

Mr. NORRIS. If I were Secretary of Agriculture, it would be a very simple thing. I would not issue any proclamation putting milk or any of its products under the provisions of this proposed law.

Mr. REED. Then why does not the Senator offer an amendment to exempt them?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is anticipating me. I have already voted for such an amendment. I voted in the committee to strike that provision out. I will vote here to strike it out. But I will vote for the bill even if it is not stricken out.

Mr. SMITH and Mr. BARKLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. Let me answer the Senator from Pennsylvania a little further.

In the next place, the attempt is, it seems to me, by these questions, by these technical suggestions, to defeat a bill whose aim is to give to the farmers of the country the cost of production of their products. There is an electric-light corporation in the city of Washington, there are railroads all over the country, and we have practically been legislating for years for all public-utility corporations, to give them cost of production, to give them a profit. In a gas case which came from Baltimore, almost within sight of this Capitol, the Supreme Court set aside a finding of a commission over in Maryland because they found they did not allow the corporation 8 percent profit on the value of their gas concern. Now we are called on here to legislate to give to the farmer just the cost of production, and all kinds of questions are submitted, and impossible conditions, which, under regulations we have a right to assume will be intelligent and fair, to be issued by the Secretary of Agriculture, never will arise, never in God's kingdom. But we are trying to build them up here to find some technical reason how it is possible some time, some place, by somebody, in some way, somewhere, to get a technical case that is going to be impossible to administer.

I believe that if the Secretary of Agriculture applied this law to all the basic products mentioned in the bill, in many of the cases it would fail, because I honestly think it would be impossible to administer it. I am assuming that the Secretary of Agriculture is going to act in good faith.

I yield now to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I just wanted to ask a question of the Senator. If all of us are agreed that agricultural products are now notoriously below the cost of production, how did we find it out? How do we find out that they are below the cost of production if we have not the ability to find out the cost of production? That is one of the problems before us now. We all admit that the prices are below the cost of production. How much? How far? How do we arrive at that? How do we know it?

If it be true that we all know that the prices are below the cost of production, why can we not find out what is the cost of production? I should like to hear someone explain that. It is common knowledge among us all, so we say, that the prices are below the cost of production. Now, we say, let us bring them up to the cost of production. It is said, "You cannot do that. You do not know anything about that."

How do we know, then, even now, that the prices are below the cost of production? The farmers are so prosperous they are paying off all their mortgages, they are in the lap of luxury. Why should we disturb them? The absurd proposition we have here is that we cannot figure the cost of production, and at the same time all of us declare that the farmers are being ruined because everything is selling for a price below the cost of production.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The penalty provided applies whether it is in the nature of a criminal penalty, a fine or imprisonment, or a penalty to be imposed by a civil process. It applies to the purchaser as well as to the producer. It does not follow the commodity any further.

I want to submit this question to the Senator. We will say that the world price of wheat is 40 cents a bushel. The Secretary of Agriculture has issued a proclamation that the cost of producing American wheat is 50 cents a bushel. I come to the Senator to sell my wheat to him, and he is compelled to pay me 50 cents a bushel under this amendment. After he gets the wheat, what is going to happen to it? There is no penalty against the second purchaser of that wheat, there is no way we can compel anybody else to take it off his hands at above the market price, which, for all practical purposes, is the world price. Is the Senator expected, under this provision, just to hold that wheat? Is he expected to sell it for less than he paid me for it? What is going to happen to the second price after it has been purchased from the producer?

Mr. NORRIS. If I understand the Senator—and I am doubtful whether I do—he assumes that I am a purchaser of the wheat he produces, and I pay at least the price fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture as the cost of production. He asks me what I am going to do with it. Is that the question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I mean how can you compel the second purchaser who may want to take it from you to pay you what you have paid me, which is 10 cents above the world price?

Mr. NORRIS. All right; it cannot be done; but the second purchaser is going to buy that wheat; I will not sell it for less than it costs, and I will ask him for something in addition. Every other purchaser and dealer in wheat all over the United States will have to do the same thing; he will have to pay an increased price. If he sells it to the miller he will have to pay an increased price. In other words, as far as that is concerned, there will be no change from present conditions. The elevator man buys the wheat and pays a dollar a bushel for it, let us say, and the world market for wheat is only 50 cents a bushel, but he pays a dollar. Is he going to sell that to the mill for less than a dollar? He can if he wants to. If he can get a dollar a bushel he may get it; he is under no restriction, under no restraint, under no law to act any differently in regard to that wheat than he now does.

Mr. BARKLEY. But suppose the millers have a supply on hand sufficient to last, we will say, for 6 months or a year; or, in the case of cotton, suppose there is enough cotton to last 2 years, does the Senator believe that this provision will work out so as to bring any sort of pressure on the purchaser of cotton or of wheat beyond the first purchaser to compel him to pay more than the market price for it?

Mr. NORRIS. If there was a supply of cotton to last 2 or 3 years, perhaps it would not work at all. If I were the Secretary of Agriculture, I would not try to employ it in the case of cotton, if that is the condition. What would happen? Why the man would not buy it. If I were a producer of wheat and the Senator had to pay me a certain price, and he thought he could not resell it for that much, he would not buy it.

Mr. BARKLEY. And if the buyer knew in advance that he could not resell the wheat at the price he paid, why would he buy it?

Mr. NORRIS. He would not.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then there cannot be any sale for it; that is the very point.

Mr. NORRIS. No one would have to buy it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suppose it would pile up in the field and not be sold to anybody.

Mr. NORRIS. A price would be fixed, and no purchaser in the United States could buy wheat unless he paid that price. Unless somebody did buy it, there would not be a mill in operation; there would not be any wheat ground. If we are going to have that kind of condition, it will take a proclamation of God Almighty to enforce it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not so sure but that it would take more than that.

Mr. NORRIS. The truth is, if there is not a demand for wheat or for cotton, it will never be sold; it will not be sold now. This proposal does not change the law of supply and demand; it does not make any change in it.

The Senator assumes that if we raise the price of wheat to give the farmer, whom we all love with such ardent fervor, the cost of production of the food we eat, if we do such a radical thing as that, nobody will buy it. If they do not buy it, they will not eat bread. Suppose, instead of this happening, and a price being fixed by the Government, that God took a hand and only allowed the farmers to produce one third of the crop of wheat they now produce, would it be said, "Why, God has interfered; he has raised the price of wheat; we will not buy it; we will not use it"?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield again.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would this penalty apply to a case where a man swapped his wheat for goods? If he took a load of wheat to a store and got a stove valued at $25, would that be regarded as a purchase within the meaning of this penalty? Frequently that happens. A man has no market for a commodity and takes it into town and exchanges it. Under the theory of barter and sale there is a value fixed upon the article.

Mr. NORRIS. That is not done where wheat is raised. Maybe it is done where they raise tobacco, but where wheat is raised they do not do that. If a farmer wants a stove and wishes to pay for it with wheat, he takes his wheat to the elevator, sells his wheat, and then buys the stove.

Mr. BARKLEY. Suppose there is no elevator and he wants to swap his wheat for a stove or suppose he wants to swap his wheat for a hog.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us take this case. Suppose there is not an elevator within a thousand miles of that farmer; where is that poor fellow going to sell his wheat?

Mr. BARKLEY. He sells it to a buyer at the railroad station who ships it 500 miles away to an elevator.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; the buyer at the railroad station would have to pay the price fixed. After the price is fixed there will not be any difference between the business operation then and that which takes place now—not a particle; there is not any new element in it. If by act of God the price of wheat went up on account of low production, then the man who bought the wheat would have to pay more for it; and he would be glad to get it, and pay more for it; he would pay the price.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. The Senator's illustration of a sale to a buyer at a railroad station leads me to suggest that this proposed act would be pretty nearly unenforceable; in such a case, at least, it would be perfectly easy to evade. The buyer would simply buy the wheat delivered at Chicago; he might pay only half the proclaimed cost of production, and yet would still be technically living up to the act, because the seller would have to pay the freight, and consequently that would bring the purchase price over the proclaimed cost. It is not going to help the farmer much if the law can be evaded as easily as that.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator says it is not going to help the farmer, and then we talk about the various ways in which the farmer can avoid being helped. That is the argument. The farmer is going to evade this; he is going to sneak around in the dark and hunt a man who will buy his wheat and pay him less than the price. That is what Senators may think the farmer is going to do; but farmers are more intelligent than some Senators think they are. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, everywhere in this country there are elevators; there are dealers in wheat. They will be there when this bill is enacted and put into force; there will not then be any difference from the conditions which now prevail. The farmer will not be hunting around to find a man who will buy his wheat and pay less than the price fixed for cost of production.

Somebody ought to ask the question, "What are you going to do with the farmer who is insane?"—who has gone crazy, probably, because he has been toiling in the sun for years for you and me and has not gotten the cost of production, has not gotten the cost of the food that we are eating daily and are living on. Somebody ought to ask, "Well, what are you going to do with that kind of a farmer? When the Secretary fixes the price of wheat at a dollar, he is going to be sneaking around behind the elevator looking for some fellow who will buy his wheat for 80 cents." I just have to confess, Mr. President, that we cannot legislate for that kind of a farmer; we will just have to let him do it. Of course, if all the farmers are going to try to get as little as they can for their wheat or other products, they are not going to be helped by this bill, if they succeed, as they probably would, in violating the law.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not want the Senator to yield the floor, but merely wish to ask him a question. Under the allotment plan it is true that there are just as many chances for violation of the law on the part of the farmer as there are under the provision which the Senator was instrumental in having put in the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I think there are more chances.

Mr. WHEELER. There are many more. For instance, take the farmer who was cited as an illustration a few moments ago, who takes his own pigs and sells the sausage, unless he is exempted from the law, unless the Secretary of Agriculture makes an exemption by rule of that farmer, the fellow who buys it has got to pay a tax on it.

Assuming, for instance, some farmer wanted to take a load of wheat to market to the miller or to the elevator, the elevator man might say to him, "I cannot afford to pay the tax, but if, instead of selling me that wheat for 60 cents and making me pay the tax on it, I will give you 70 cents, provided you do not make me give you any receipt for it." Thus there is plenty of opportunity for fraud and corruption to creep in under the allotment plan.

So with reference to the provision with respect to cutting down acreage, the farmer may say that he only produced so many acres last year, and under the allotment plan we are going either to have to employ a lot of detectives and inspectors to go out and check up on the farmers or else we will have to take the farmer's word for it; we will have to take his affidavit that he only produced so much wheat the year previous in order to get the benefit of the allotment plan. So the truth about the matter is that the section the Senator offered in the committee as an amendment is much more simple in operation than is the allotment plan, and not only much more simple but, in my humble judgment, will work much more effectively with reference to wheat than will the allotment plan or the leasing plan.

I have serious doubt, as I stated this afternoon, whether or not the allotment plan will work successfully. I know that the leasing plan, so far as wheat is concerned, will not work in my section of the country, because there are thousands of acres at the present time that have not been cultivated; and if the Government leases them; all the farmers could go up on the side of the mountain and sow a lot of wheat, using land that they do not use for production at the present time. So it really seems to me that the very simplest, the very best, way of operating under this bill would be under the provision which was added by the committee, which is known as part 3.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not believe I have anything further to say excepting this: I am not opposing any of the other provisions of this bill. I have reached the time, even though I myself do not see how it can work, when any honest, sensible man thinks a certain plan will work, I am willing to let him try it; I am anxious that it succeed. I only want to give to the Secretary of Agriculture an opportunity to try a plan which, in my judgment, is much simpler and which will cost much less money, which will involve comparatively few employees to carry it out. I would put it up to him and let him use it. If he takes another plan and it works out, let him go on with it and make it work. I will not try to dig a hole under his feet or try to tell him about some crazy man who may evade the law in some place, or remind him of some technical objection. Let him go on and succeed; and if the plan will work, so much the better. If he finds it will not work, or if in the case of some commodities, as I believe he should reach the conclusion to begin with, that he ought to apply only the plan provided in part 3 of the bill, and he should find when he does, for instance, if he should apply it to wheat, that the wheat farmers of America are anxious to get a better price for their wheat, he will not have any difficulty; it will not be necessary for him to hire a whole lot of detectives to go around and trail the farmers of America so as to prevent them from going somewhere and secretly selling their wheat at less than the price he shall have fixed.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I suppose the Senate is nearing adjourning time for the afternoon. I wish to take up less than perhaps a minute's time in calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that the press of today informs us that Mr. Eugene Meyer has tendered his resignation as the head of the Federal Reserve Board. The press states that Mr. Meyer tendered his resignation some days ago, perhaps 10 days ago. I am sorry, Mr. President, that Mr. Meyer did not tender his resignation more than 10 days ago, and I am also sorry that it was not accepted before the 10 days which have intervened. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to my remarks on March 15 regarding this man and the necessity for his resignation and his elimination from the head of the financial structure of this Nation.

However, Mr. President, the resignation of Mr. Meyer is not going to be enough. Mr. Meyer is only one. Every crook and crevice of the financial structure is today in the hands of Mr. Meyer and his kind. They have planted their eggs and hatched them out through a long period of years until there is only one cackle that can be heard and only one kind of philosophy in the financial administration. Unless they are whipped out of every crook and crevice in the department, they have the power to designate what is to be the policy in handling the financial affairs and the banking structure of this country.

I hope that the resignation of Meyer is not only going to be accepted almost immediately and someone appointed who will carry out the ideas and decrees of the Democratic platform and the promises of us Democrats, but that it is going to mean that the Treasury Department and the Comptroller's office and sundry other organizations of the Democratic administration will breathe into the Congress legislation for a sound expansion of our currency, as it is called, either through remonetization of silver or through some depreciation in the value of the gold dollar.

Now that the chairman of the committee has announced in favor of it and the report of the committee seems to show that it is a necessary part of the bill that there be something done, I intend at the proper time to reoffer, as an amendment to this bill, the provision which I offered to remonetize silver in the last Congress, hoping that the elimination of Mr. Meyer from the Federal Reserve Board will be followed by other administrative changes as will give the people a chance for sound expansion.

Mr. President, I do not think we are going to do a great deal of good for the farmer with this bill. As I understand the bill, as explained by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], it means that we are going to have to compel the farmer and the farmer's wife and the farmer's boy to take cognizance and to have knowledge of every ruling that is made by the various and sundry agencies through the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BANKHEAD. O Mr. President, I do not want to be misinterpreted or misrepresented. I do not think the Senator wants to do so, but I certainly made no statement from which that inference could properly be drawn.

Mr. LONG. I do not think the Senator correctly understood me. I said that I gathered an understanding of the bill, from listening to the speeches of the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Kentucky, that the rulings which are going to be made—and I believe the Senator will understand me better now—in the enforcement and carrying out of the provisions of the bill through the Department over the signature of the Secretary of Agriculture, must be taken note of by the farmers and the farmers' wives and the farmers' boys who will come under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let us not have any misunderstanding. There is nothing in the bill compulsory on the farmer or any member of his family—not a line in it directly or by implication.

Mr. LONG. I understand we have one provision that the farmer may not sell for less than cost.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That does not apply to the farmer. It applies to the buyer.

Mr. LONG. Then we have a provision that there cannot be any conspiracy to violate the law; and therefore if a farmer who wants to sell agrees with a man who wants to buy upon some transaction not within the purview of the law, they can be tried as having engaged in a conspiracy to subvert the terms of the law. The Senator from Alabama, being a very able lawyer, is bound to know now, upon any reasonable reflection, that everyone comes within the purview of the law.

Mr. President, there was something the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] brought up this afternoon in questioning the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that we have not thought about at all. How are we going to keep the man who wants to sell his hog to the processor from agreeing that he is going to sell him for something less than the value that has been fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture, including the tax? For instance, Mr. President, a friend of mine has a hog and he brings the hog to me to buy. I say, "All right, I will pay you 8 cents a pound. That is all I can afford to pay you today; but I am not going to give you a process certificate where I have to pay 12 more cents a pound to get the hog." I say to my friend who brings me the hog, "I am willing to give you 8 cents a pound to buy the 'dad-gummed' hog, provided you do not make me give you a process certificate so I will have to go back and pay 12 cents more for the hog to the Government. If you will sell me the hog for 8 cents or 10 cents, I will buy the hog; but I am not going to give you a process certificate so I will have to go back and mail the Government a check for 12 cents a pound more for the hog."

My friend says, "All right. I want to sell the hog. I have the hog and I have got to sell it because I do not need the hog and I do not want to feed the hog, but I want to get whatever money I can out of the hog." So in order to get rid of the hog he sells him to me for 8 or 10 cents a pound, which is 2 cents above the market price, but for which he should not sell the hog at all under the provisions of the bill. He does not require me to give him a process certificate in order that he can collect the other 10 cents out of the Government, because he wants to get rid of the hog and keep from feeding him that night. Then my friend and myself both are subject to be brought up for trial and sent to the penitentiary for 3 years because we have entered into a conspiracy to violate a ruling of the Secretary of Agriculture, because he got rid of the hog he did not want to feed and I got a hog I would only pay 10 cents to get.

That is the kind of bill we have here. If I have not stated it correctly I want to be corrected. That is the bill as I understand it. Angels of the Senate that we are, Mr. President, we are called upon to vote upon it. If in that way one little old hog is sold that cannot be sold in any other way to a man who is going to kill him and use him or sell him, then every man who engages in that nefarious undertaking is guilty of a penitentiary offense. If that is not what the bill provides I want the Senator from Alabama to correct me.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the Senator mean that is the provision under the amendment offered?

Mr. LONG. No; with the amendment stricken out.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; there is no provision of that kind in the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I beg to differ with the Senator from Alabama, and assure him that it is in the bill. He will have a ruling of the Department of Agriculture fixing the tax, and when the tax is fixed he will have to give a receipt for the hog. When the sells that hog, the Government will collect that tax under the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BANKHEAD. From the processor.

Mr. WHEELER. But if the farmer helps the processor to get around that tax——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, the Senator means if he enters into a conspiracy to evade the law? Why, of course, Mr. President, I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. If he wants to sell that hog to the processor and the processor says, "I will give you 10 cents for the hog and I cannot take it unless you do that", then we will prevent the farmer from selling his hog or place him in the position of being charged with a conspiracy—just what the Senator said would happen under the other provision which we are discussing. There is no difference whatever with reference to the two provisions.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am surprised to hear my friend argue that a mere refusal by a buyer to pay a big price constitutes a conspiracy between himself and the seller. I do not think the Senator would insist that the seller was entering into a conspiracy with the buyer under such circumstances.

Mr. WHEELER. It is perfectly apparent there may be innumerable cases where the man cannot sell his hog unless he makes some concession to the processor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Montana is friendly to the bill. I assume that he understands that one of the primary purposes is to prevent anyone from indulging in any such unfair practices.

Mr. WHEELER. I am friendly to the bill, but I am just as friendly to the other portions of the bill which the Senator wants to strike out because of the fact that the Department of Agriculture and a few professors up there, who sit around the office and never saw a bushel of wheat in their lives, see fit to send down to the Senate certain legislation and say to us, "Jump through the hoop and vote for this bill; do not cross a 't' or dot an 'i'", and ask that we shall give the Secretary of Agriculture the greatest amount of power that has ever been granted in any bill in the history of the United States, the power to fix rules and regulations of the kind we have been discussing. Then the Senator from Alabama contends, because of the fact that we want to have a provision that the Secretary of Agriculture may not want, that we are opposed to aiding the farmer. I am not going to be bound by any such statement as that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator from Alabama has never stated that he opposed the provision on the ground that the Secretary of Agriculture did not want it. I think the Senator from Montana knows that I opposed it from the very inception.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to enable me to submit a request?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its labors today it take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow; that at not later than 12:30 o'clock tomorrow the Senate proceed to vote upon the pending amendment, and that beginning at 12 o'clock noon tomorrow no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 5 minutes on the pending amendment.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I cannot consent to that. My friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] has requested that he be called in case a motion should be made to recess, because he wishes to move an adjournment so that the 30-hour bill may be taken up in the morning hour tomorrow.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana certainly misunderstood the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. LONG. Possibly I did.

Mr. SMITH. He passed here a little while ago and said that he would offer no obstruction with reference to the pending measure, but that he would let its consideration proceed without any further effort to inject his matter, hoping that we would get through with the bill by tomorrow night.

Mr. LONG. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. SMITH. I want to join with the leader on our side in trying to get some agreement whereby we can finish consideration of the bill tomorrow if it be possible to do so. I hope we will reach an agreement before we take a recess by which we can at least hope that we see the end of the discussion on the bill.

Mr. LONG. I withdraw my objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to make a suggestion about the unanimous-consent agreement. As I heard it, the limitation would apply only to the pending amendment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio to the committee amendment. I do not believe the Senator from Arkansas understood that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I did not understand that that is the case. I thank the Senator from Nebraska. My request, then, should apply to the pending committee amendment and all amendments that may be pending or offered thereto.

Mr. McNARY. I understand the purpose of the proposed agreement is to have a vote on the pending amendment, and all amendments pending thereto, at 1 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I said 12:30.

Mr. McNARY. Twelve-thirty o'clock, with a limitation of 10 minutes on debate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Five minutes.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Arkansas knows that I want to cooperate in every way in an early disposition of the unfinished business; but this afternoon the hour is late, and a number of Senators are necessarily absent on account of business matters, and I do not think 30 minutes tomorrow on this amendment will be sufficient time for its discussion. Secondly, I do not think 5 minutes would be ample time on other amendments that may be offered, or that are pending, or on the bill.

I suggest to the Senator that we recess now until 12 o'clock tomorrow, or adjourn.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, unless we can get an agreement or a vote on this amendment, I shall not consent to a recess.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have not yet concluded, please.

I shall object to a unanimous-consent agreement now to vote on the pending amendment tomorrow at 12:30. If this matter comes up in an orderly manner, after sufficient debate, and when the subject has been exhausted tomorrow, I shall be glad to cooperate with the Senator on some proposal that might limit debate on future amendments; but this afternoon, at half past 5, with a number of Senators absent, and an important amendment before the Senate that involves the tax that will be laid on processors, the sums of money to be received from the processors, to limit debate tomorrow to 30 minutes would be unjust and unfair to those absent; and they are absent on both sides of the Chamber. If the Senator will withhold his proposition tonight, and move to recess or adjourn at this time——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No, Mr. President.

Mr. McNARY. Very well; just a moment—and then, tomorrow, if he will offer a proposal after we dispose of this amendment, following legitimate discussion, I shall cooperate upon a reasonable unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, of course everyone understands that a single objection will prevent the agreement that I have asked; but we have consumed the entire day in the discussion of this one amendment, and all Senators have been present except 2 or 3. There are only 2 or 3 Senators absent. We shall never find a day when that number will not be found absent. Senators have remained here, and we have discussed this amendment all day. Now the Senator from Oregon says that he is unwilling to enter into any agreement to vote on this amendment. In that view of the matter, I think we ought to proceed and vote this afternoon.

Mr. LONG. I think so.

Mr. McNARY. Very well; I have no objection to that. I said that rather than enter into a unanimous-consent agreement I would prefer to vote this afternoon.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

Mr. McNARY. I do not want to assume the responsibility of acquiescing in an agreement that I think is unfair to the absent Senators, and I shall not do so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the absent Senators have had no opportunity at all to discuss the amendment. We shall always have absentees. We shall never find the time when every Member of the Senate is present.

In view of the fact that we have taken this entire day in the discussion of one committee amendment, I feel justified in pressing for action; and I am going to withdraw my request and ask the Senate to proceed with its business.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I think the Senate has discussed this amendment sufficiently for each and every one of us to understand it. I hope we may be able to reach a vote before we take a recess this afternoon, and get this amendment at least out of the way, so that the balance of the bill may be amended by Members on the floor who have amendments to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator from Oregon has interposed an objection?

Mr. McNARY. I have; yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I should not object to extending the time until not later than 1 o'clock, and expanding the limitation of speeches to 10 minutes, but surely, in view of the fact that we have taken a whole day to consider this one amendment, the Senator from Oregon cannot object to that.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me? Does the Senator mean to include the mortgage amendment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No, no; I have reference only to the committee amendment, known as part 3, and the amendments that are pending and may be offered to that. It is the cost-of-production proposal in the bill.

Mr. COUZENS. Then no limit is proposed on debate with respect to the mortgage section?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; I have not asked for a limitation on the bill generally.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I had thought of making a few remarks on the subject. They probably will not require more than 15 minutes. I should be willing to consent, so far as I am personally concerned, to a unanimous-consent agreement to vote not later than 2 o'clock tomorrow on the pending amendment, speeches being limited to 15 minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I will modify the request so that not later than 2 o'clock tomorrow the Senate will proceed to vote on the committee amendment and all amendments that may be pending or that may be offered thereto without further debate.

Mr. LONG. That is, all that may be offered to the committee amendment that is pending?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; and that upon reconvening tomorrow no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes on the amendment or on any amendment thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, just a moment. That refers specifically to part 3?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; that is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I just want to wind up this matter and have one understanding. I was in the midst of trying to get one point settled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Louisiana had the floor. I did not wish to take him off the floor. He very kindly yielded to me to submit the request, and he still has the floor.

Mr. LONG. I do not want to delay adjourning, but I do not want to speak again on this amendment tomorrow.

While the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Kentucky are here, I do not want anyone to have any doubt about what he is voting for on this bill. Mr. President, title 3 is the most understandable part that there is in the bill. It is the least drastic part that there is in the bill; but I admit that however much less drastic it may be than the balance of this bill it is drastic itself. The sad part of the matter, however, is that every housewife, every farm boy, and every farmer must take note of every ruling that is made by the Secretary of Agriculture. Otherwise, regardless of what farm sale may take place between the producer and the processor that does not conform with the processing tax, he will be guilty of a conspiracy and subject to being put in jail by the court for 3 years. There may be 100 rulings of the Secretary or there may be 500 or 5,000 rulings, but they will have to take cognizance of them all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I present two amendments and ask to have them printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, before the recess is taken I should like to ask a question, if I may, of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. It will take me only a moment.

The word "consumer" appears in section 16, page 21, line 20, referring to floor stocks. That section provides for a tax on inventories. I should like to address to the Senator from South Carolina, as chairman of the committee, a question to elicit his definition of whom the consumer might be.

For instance, take the manufacturer of a shoe who buys thread for the purpose of constructing a shoe. Is the manufacturer the consumer of the thread, or is the purchaser of the shoe, who wears the shoe, the consumer of the thread? I should think the bill undoubtedly means that the manufacturer who purchases the thread is the consumer.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the very same question came up in reference to automobile tires, as to the processor who processed the material that went into the casing, and whether that tax would be carried on to the automobile-tire man when he processed his tire. The committee were of opinion that it is the man who processes the fabric in the first instance who is the consumer, and the bill so declares.

Mr. BARBOUR. In other words, the manufacturer in the case I speak of and in like cases, in the opinion of the Senator, the chairman of the committee, would be the consumer as the word is used in that section?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FRAZIER. I offer a proposed amendment to the pending amendment, part 3, and ask to have it printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. CLARK. I ask that sundry amendments which I intend to offer to this bill may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made.

Mr. McGILL. I send forward an amendment, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business in open session.

MINISTER TO DENMARK—RUTH BRYAN OWEN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 12, 1933.

To the Senate of the United States:

I nominate Ruth Bryan Owen, of Florida, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Denmark and Iceland.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate confirmation of this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent for the immediate confirmation of this nomination. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent that the President may be notified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reports of committees are in order.

If there be no reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

THE JUDICIARY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Joseph W. Woodrough, of Nebraska, to be judge, eighth circuit, vice Arba S. Van Valkenburgh, retired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

IN THE ARMY

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry officers in the Army.

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent that the Army nominations may be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations will be confirmed en bloc; and, without objection, the President will be notified.

That completes the calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask that the President be notified of the confirmation of Judge Woodrough. There has been a vacancy in that district for some time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified.

The Senate resumed legislative session.

RECESS

Mr. SMITH. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 44 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, April 13, 1933, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 12, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Thou who art all in all and from whom cometh the highest good in all the world, we praise Thee that the joy of our Lord is forever and ever. We need so many things to walk worthily with Thee. Heavenly Father, gather up our tendencies, our failures, and our weaknesses; harmonize them with Thy holy will and blend them in a volume of spiritual melody; steal into our hearts like the rhythm of unearthly peace. We pray that high hopes, peace, and contentment may hang over our country like a summer sun out of which come all life and blessing. We beseech Thee, dear Lord, to hear us in our prayer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GEORGE ROGERS CLARK SESQUICENTENNIAL COMMISSION

The SPEAKER. A vacancy having been created upon the George Rogers Clark Sesquicentennial Commission by the death of the Honorable Will R. Wood, of Indiana, the Chair appoints to fill said vacancy the Honorable ROBERT LUCE, Representative from the State of Massachusetts.

PRESENTATION OF PICTURE TO THOMAS H. CULLEN

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, it is on very rare occasions that the Congress is accorded any commendation by the public for meritorious work well done. There are exceptional cases, however, and it is my pleasure this morning to recite one.

On yesterday the employees of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, in New York, and the Allied Metal Trade Industries, through Representative DELANEY, presented to our distinguished assistant leader, Hon. THOMAS H. CULLEN, the dean of the New York delegation, a magnificent oil painting of our distinguished President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, in recognition of the services rendered by him in behalf of the employees of the Brooklyn Navy Yard and of the other navy yards of the country. So it is a pleasant interlude in the terrific grind here to pause and take this opportunity of recording a commendation well deserved by our distinguished colleague, Representative CULLEN.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the remarks of Congressman DELANEY in presenting the portrait and the response of our distinguished assistant leader, THOMAS H. CULLEN. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

REMARKS OF CONGRESSMAN JOHN J. DELANEY, REPRESENTING THE SEVENTH NEW YORK CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT, DURING HIS PRESENTATION OF A PORTRAIT OF PRESIDENT FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT TO CONGRESSMAN THOMAS H. CULLEN IN BEHALF OF THE EMPLOYEES AND REPRESENTATIVES OF THE NAVY YARD AT BROOKLYN, N.Y.

Congressman CULLEN, on behalf of the employees of the Brooklyn Navy Yard and their representatives, as well as representatives of the various labor organizations assembled here this morning, I take pleasure in presenting to you a portrait of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt. This gift is made in appreciation of the services rendered by you in behalf of the workers of the Brooklyn Navy Yard. The employees of the yard have a keen realization of your untiring efforts in behalf of all matters affecting their welfare. You have always been in the vanguard in proposing legislation which would have for its purpose the expanding of the facilities in the Brooklyn Navy Yard and they are also most appreciative for your present efforts in the matter of collaborating with those who believe that we should build up our Navy to the strength provided for in the London Treaty.

RESPONSE OF CONGRESSMAN CULLEN

Congressman DELANEY, this is a very happy moment for me, having you and the representatives of the workers of the Brooklyn Navy Yard present me with this beautiful portrait of our great President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt. I can still vividly recall the first time I met him when he came to Albany as a member of the State senate in 1910, and where I cultivated a friendship with him that has been very dear and near to me ever since.

When Franklin Roosevelt resigned from the senate to come to Washington in 1913 to accept an appointment as Assistant Secretary of the Navy under President Wilson's administration, he immediately started out by proving himself a friend of the Navy and also took a special interest in the workers of the Brooklyn Navy Yard. In that connection I might rehearse a little story in conjunction with one of his visits to the navy yard in Brooklyn. Mr. Philip Engel, who is holding this picture, was at work in the yard on the occasion of this visit of Assistant Secretary Roosevelt. Mr. Roosevelt called him aside to discuss with him the different phases of work that were being performed by the men. Mr. Engel, in his working clothes, sat with him for the best part of an hour explaining and discussing the various projects carried on in the yard. Mr. Roosevelt in the course of that conversation manifested a keen and sincere interest in the welfare of our Navy. He had a splendid insight and profound understanding of the problems of the men, as well as a strong realization of the necessity of a strong Navy. As President of the United States today, Franklin D. Roosevelt is vitally interested in having our Navy kept up to the standard provided for by the London Naval Treaty.

He is contemplating including in his unemployment construction bill the program submitted by Chairman CARL VINSON, of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, dealing with the upbuilding of our Navy, which, in my opinion, is one of the most comprehensive naval-construction programs that has come to the attention of Congress in my time.

This beautiful portrait will hang on the wall of my office as long as I remain in Congress. Then I will bring it to my home, where I shall cherish it with many pleasant recollections of its presentation to me today. It will also be a constant reminder of my friendship and great admiration for President Roosevelt, a friendship that has ripened to an extent that even today, when I have occasion to call upon him at a time when he is so valiantly striving to overcome the many difficulties and problems facing our country in this great national crisis, despite his high position and multitudinous duties, he still calls me "Tom" and I call him "Frank."

I desire to extend my thanks to your delegation for your kindness, and through you I wish to express to the workers of the Brooklyn Navy Yard my sincere appreciation for their kind thought. You may rest assured that I shall continue to extend my whole-hearted cooperation in all matters pertaining to the welfare of our Navy and the workers of the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

Through Mr. Engel and Mr. McDonough and the other members of your delegation I desire to extend to Mr. Harry M. Jockers my sincere appreciation and congratulations upon his wonderful work in the painting of this beautiful portrait of President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

HAROLD E. HUGHES—FRANK P. GIBSON

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw all reports, evidence, and affidavits in the claims against the United States for the relief of Harold E. Hughes, H.R. 1974, Seventy-third Congress, and for the relief of the estate of Frank P. Gibson, H.R. 1975, Seventy-third Congress, referred to the Committee on Claims.

It is my intention to withdraw the bills on the ground the claimants have no status against the United States for relief.

I have the consent of the chairman of the committee to withdraw these bills.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Calendar Wednesday business, in order today, be dispensed with.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object because I want to press on with the farm relief bill, it is not the intention of the gentleman from Texas to have a roll call upon this bill this afternoon, I understand?

Mr. BLANTON. Would a roll call interfere with anything the gentleman from New York desires to do this afternoon?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. It certainly would materially interfere with my plans for this afternoon.

Mr. JONES. I may state, Mr. Speaker, that the time left for general debate ranges between 5 and 6 hours, as I remember it, and I do not expect to have a roll call on this bill this afternoon.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr Speaker, I have been approached by a number of Members as to whether or not the House will adjourn tomorrow afternoon over until Monday. Of course, I am but one Member of the House. However, if we have any legislation, as I think we will, on Friday and Saturday, I think the House ought to stay here and attend to it. [Applause.] So far as I am concerned, if there is any legislation to be considered on Friday and Saturday I shall insist as strenuously as I can that we stay in session and dispose of it.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Can the majority leader tell us what legislation will be here Friday and Saturday?

Mr. BYRNS. I have hopes; that is all I can say. I have communicated with all the chairmen who have these bills pending before their committees. I am hoping, for instance, that the Committee on Ways and Means may report the bill providing for an extension of the gasoline tax, and that possibly we might have that up on Friday. I do not know whether this will be done or not, but I believe we ought not to say we will adjourn until we are satisfied there will be nothing for us to do.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I am unable to state definitely just when the Committee on Ways and Means will report out the bill extending the tax on gasoline; but I can say definitely that it will be in the immediate future. If not Friday and Saturday, certainly it will be not later than Monday.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. I was wondering whether or not the Committee on Ways and Means is going to favorably report out a bill to take the 2-cent tax off bank checks. That tax ought to be repealed immediately. In my judgment, this is one of the most important matters to be considered.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I agree with what the gentleman states; but we doubt whether that will be reached now. At least it should be considered. I think it is very important.

Mr. BYRNS. I may say to the gentleman I understand the tax on bank checks is bringing in between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000 per year. If this be true, and we wish to balance the Budget, it is very essential that the tax be continued for the present, although, personally, I should like to see the time come when we can do away with it.

Mr. BLANTON. It is keeping more money in socks and under bed slats than anything else Congress has ever done.

Mr. BYRNS. I realize the force of the argument of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order. They are delaying consideration of the pending bill.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman withhold that a moment? I want to ask the majority leader another question. As I understand the statement of the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, there is very little probability that the measure referred to will be ready for consideration this week. If this is the case, what else has the majority leader in mind?

Mr. BYRNS. I had hoped that possibly the Wagner bill might be reported, although I have no assurance to that effect.

Mr. SNELL. How far have they gone with it?

Mr. BYRNS. I think we can come nearer determining tomorrow just what will be ready than we can today.

Mr. SNELL. From all the information I can get, there will be nothing ready at that time; but, of course, I am not on the inside.

Mr. BYRNS. I think we will know more about it tomorrow than we do now.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. FISH. Has the gentleman any program for tomorrow?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; we expect to take up the embargo bill tomorrow.

Mr. FISH. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. BYRNS. We expect to take that bill up at the conclusion of the consideration of the pending bill, which will probably take an hour or two tomorrow.

Mr. BOILEAU. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] at what point he intends to have the Committee rise this afternoon. Will it be before general debate is concluded or not?

Mr. JONES. That matter has not been determined. We want to conclude most of the general debate today, and although we might not quite finish general debate, we hope to.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman will realize that I am very much interested in a motion to recommit, and I am wondering if the House would be in session at the time that point would be in order today or not.

Mr. JONES. There will not be any roll call, because we will not more than finish general debate today, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNS. I think we can agree that we will not have a roll call today.

Mr. JONES. I have already stated we would not have a roll call on the pending bill and that will take care of what the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. Can it be understood, definitely, that the proceedings will not reach the stage where a motion to recommit will be in order?

Mr. JONES. I practically made that statement.

Mr. KVALE. But the gentleman did not make the definite statement.

Mr. JONES. If it were made, it would not be disposed of, and we would not have a roll call. Is not that what the gentleman wanted to know?

Mr. KVALE. Then if the motion is made, it will not be put?

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

Mr. RAGON. Then it can be definitely understood that there will be no roll calls this afternoon.

Mr. JONES. We will not have time for a roll call because we have left over 5 hours of general debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business in order today?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 4795) to provide emergency relief with respect to agricultural indebtedness, to refinance farm mortgages at lower rates of interest, to amend and supplement the Federal Farm Loan Act, to provide for the orderly liquidation of joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 4795, with Mr. ARNOLD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DOXEY].

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday when our distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture occupied this floor, he explained in detail the provisions of this bill known as the "Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933."

He stated however that he would not discuss title IV of this act and would expect other members of the Agriculture Committee to devote some time during this debate to a discussion of this title of the bill.

I am intensely interested in this bill as a whole. I full well realize that about 40 percent of the farms in this country are mortgaged, that our farm debts are staggering, that the farmers' interest rates are a crushing burden, that immediate farm relief through debt and tax relief is absolutely necessary for the restoration of permanent prosperity throughout the country. The purpose of this mortgage-relief legislation goes to the very roots of the present-day farm problem.

This measure is not intended as a dole or charity. Its purpose is not to transfer to the Government the whole mortgage burden, but it aims to stabilize the farm-mortgage market. If properly administered, it will give definite, direct help to distressed mortgage-burdened farmers and call a halt to foreclosures of farm properties.

It, then, of necessity must be legislation not alone in the interest of the farmer but also in the interest of the creditor.

The opponents of this bill have stressed many objectionable features and said it will prove a disappointment, all of which may be true, but they cannot deny that it does bring the farmer into the picture where heretofore he has been left out. It is the only measure of this character before us, and although many Members here no doubt feel they could improve the bill by amendments, they also must realize that it could be loaded down with amendments to such an extent that we would get no legislation at all, which would be a calamity.

Action is necessary. Dilatory tactics will not produce results. This administration has approved this measure as it is, and I am not going to endeavor to place any obstacles in the way of this measure's being enacted into a law.

Title IV of this act, when the bill was first considered, was not a part of its provisions. When it was incorporated in what is known as the "Robinscon bill" (Calendar No. 18) and referred to the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency and reported by that committee title IV was stricken out. But its great importance was stressed, and the House Committee on Agriculture, the committee to which this House referred the President's message, includes it as title IV in its bill H.R. 4795, known as the "Jones bill", and I want to say to you, my friends, it is a very important part of this legislation. It is not as complete and far-reaching as what is known as the "Glenn-Smith drainage bill" that some of us have worked for night and day, in season and out of season, but it does in a measure give farm relief through tax relief.

Briefly, title IV of this bill provides—

Refinancing of agricultural improvement, district indebtedness for the benefit of farmers.

Section 401: The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans in an aggregate amount not exceeding $50,000,000 to drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation districts, and similar districts, duly organized under the laws of any State, and to political subdivisions of States, which projects are devoted chiefly to the improvement of land for agricultural purposes, for the purpose of enabling such districts to reduce and refinance their outstanding indebtedness incurred with respect to such project.

Loans shall be made subject to the same terms and conditions as loans made under section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, except that loans under this section shall be subject to the following terms and conditions:

First. The term of any such loan shall not exceed 40 years.

Second. Such loans shall be secured by bonds issued by the borrower which are a lien on the real property within the district or on the assessment of benefits to such property by reason of the project.

Third. The borrower shall not issue any additional bonds so secured except with the consent of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Fourth. Out of the assessments against the real property within the district the costs of operation and maintenance as well as interest on outstanding obligations are to be paid and the balance to be applied to the retirement of the bonds held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Fifth. The borrower shall reduce the indebtedness of the landowners within the district by an amount corresponding to the amount by which the indebtedness of the borrower is reduced by reason of the operation of the section—the landowners on a pro-rata basis to share in the benefits.

No loans shall be made until the Reconstruction Finance Corporation—

(a) Has caused an appraisal to be made of the property securing the bonds;

(b) Has considered the economic soundness of the project; and

(c) Has been satisfied that an agreement between the applicant and holders of bonds has been reached which is fair to purchase or refund the outstanding bonds considering the average market price of said bonds over a 6 months' period ending March 1, 1933, which will necessarily bring about a substantial reduction of the outstanding indebtedness of the district. The benefits will be passed on to the landowner, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will be paid out of reduced assessments. The benefits are extended to Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico.

The provision of this bill as set forth in title IV affects possibly 5,000,000 people, for the most part what are known as "small" farmers with large families, living in about 35 different States of this Union. It involves more than 325,000,000 acres of land situated within these districts.

It is a national problem and not merely a local one. This Congress is the place to deal with it. The necessity for this relief is more than urgent and demands quick action to avert a further calamity over which these distressed people have no control. Nature itself forced this additional burden upon them. I deem this a real opportunity to do something worth while, constructive, and truly beneficial.

Only a few days ago I stood here on the floor of this House and spoke in favor of the emergency farm relief bill, and in the course of my remarks I said in substance that whatever legislation we passed to stimulate prices of farm commodities would necessarily be artificial, but we should go further and enact laws to give the oppressed farmers relief through tax, debt, interest, and mortgage relief, and that such legislation would go to the very fundamentals of the matter.

That hour has struck. The time is at hand. The question before us is not whether or not we approve of all the provisions of this bill and would like to see some changes in it, but the proposition is, this being another step in the President's program, are we going with the administration or not? I am.

This type of legislation seeks to aid and bring relief to our substantial citizens who are the very backbone of our Nation and tide them safely over the turbulent waters that threaten to drown them. I am going to help them if I can. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take any time to make a speech, but I want to ask a question of the chairman of the committee. Just what effect do you expect this bill to have on the present value of the farm-loan banks? For instance, if I own $10,000 in bonds in those banks, what will be the effect on the value of the bonds?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman means bonds of the Federal land banks?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I do not believe that they will be injuriously affected, and in my judgment the operation of the bill will further safeguard the banks.

Mr. SNELL. In what way? I desire the information, because I have been asked that question several times.

Mr. JONES. There is provision made in the bill for loaning to the Federal land banks the use of $50,000,000 as a part of the surplus which is to be paid back.

Mr. SNELL. Is it the intention to force the present holders of 4½-percent bonds to exchange them for the new 4-percent bonds?

Mr. JONES. No. There is no intention of that kind. Of course, all of these bonds have written into their face an option to refinance them after they have been out 10 years. Of course, that option would be available, regardless of the provisions of any bill.

Mr. SNELL. And in that way they could come to me as the owner and say to me, "Now, you will have to take 4 percent bonds, or we will pay you the face value for your present bonds"?

Mr. JONES. Yes. They could do that if the option period has arrived, but it would not interfere with their rights at all. It would leave their bonds as they are.

Mr. SNELL. That is what I was desirous to find out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] has expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE].

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I am in the same position as everyone else who has discussed this bill, in that I should like to see more done to relieve the farm-mortgage situation than this bill can possibly do, yet we must all realize that neither this bill nor any other mortgage-relief legislation can solve the entire farm problem. The mortgage situation is only one part. It is only one of many problems that are confronting the farmers of this country today. It is all right at this time to express our hope and desire to support some other legislation that we think would do the job better than this bill, yet the fact remains that this is the only bill before us at this time, and the House, by a large majority of its membership, has voted to consider it without amendment, thereby indicating that it desires to take this bill as it is. Since that is the situation, I am not going to take the time of the House this afternoon in indulging in any lamentations as to what I should like to do if I had my way about it, but I am going to discuss, as briefly as I can, some of the provisions of this bill.

It must be conceded at the outset that if we could wipe out, by legislation or any other way, the entire farm-mortgage debt of this country, we would solve but a small part of the farmers' problems. With prices of farm products as they have been for the past 2 years practically no farmer has been able to secure enough income to pay his current operating costs, to say nothing of overhead such as interest and taxes. Therefore, it is very obvious that as long as present prices continue we can only at best partially relieve the farmer by cutting down indebtedness or taxes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOPE. Briefly; yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. This bill does not in itself provide for what is known as "a moratorium on debts", does it? I mean, generally, on mortgage indebtedness?

Mr. HOPE. Only to the extent that it provides for a 5-year moratorium on amortization payments.

Mr. BRIGGS. In other words, it dispenses with amortization for 5 years?

Mr. HOPE. On mortgages now held by Federal land banks, and also provides that under certain conditions, money may be loaned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the joint-stock land banks on condition that they hold off foreclosures for 2 years on the mortgages which they hold.

Mr. BRIGGS. Its principal relief is intended by way of inducement, rather than by fiat or decree of moratorium?

Mr. HOPE. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. May I ask the gentleman a further question? Has the committee made any estimate of the savings that will be brought about by this legislation to the agricultural interests of the United States by reason of scaling down of mortgages and by the reduction in interest rates?

Mr. HOPE. I do not know of any figures that have been compiled, and I do not know how any figures could be compiled to cover the savings that might be expected to be made from a scaling down of indebtedness, because that is so problematical it would be pure speculation.

Mr. BRIGGS. I have heard some estimates made of between two and three billion dollars by reason of the changes in the interest rates without regard to any scaling down of the indebtedness.

Mr. HOPE. Well, that might be true over a long period of years. As far as interest rates are concerned, I might say that the present average interest rate on farm indebtedness is 6.1 percent for the entire country. This bill provides for, at least for the next 5 years, all mortgages which are refinanced under the terms of this bill, except certain direct loans by the Federal land banks, shall bear not to exceed 4½ percent interest. That, of course, will set an example which, to some extent, will be followed by other mortgage companies and lending agencies, so that if we were to assume that at least one half of the farm mortgages of this country would have a reduction in the average amount of interest paid from 6 percent to 4½ percent that in itself would be a considerable benefit and amount to a large sum over a period of years.

I want to point out how I think the present measure will operate, but before going into that phase of the situation I think it might be well to call attention to the general farm-mortgage situation. Contrary to what seems to be a prevalent impression, a majority in number at least of our farms are not incumbered by mortgage indebtedness. The figures which I am about to quote, unless otherwise indicated, are taken from House Document No. 9, being a report based on a study made by the Department of Agriculture pertaining to farm-mortgage indebtedness. This is by far the most accurate and complete survey of the farm-mortgage problem which I have had the opportunity to examine, and I feel that Congress is very much indebted to the Department for this splendid contribution to the available information on this subject.

These figures indicate that the farm-mortgage debt of the country rests upon only 40 percent of the farms. In other words, three fifths of the farms of this country are free of mortgage. Furthermore, in 1930 the farm-mortgage indebtedness of the country constituted only 20 percent of the value of all farms. While there has possibly been some change in this situation during the past 2 years due to a further decline in real-estate values, yet it must be recalled that the farm-mortgage indebtedness of the country has also declined about 10 percent in the same period of time, so that I think the figures above given are approximately correct as of today. There are certainly few, if any, other industries in the country which can show as small a proportion of mortgage indebtedness as is the case of agriculture. Of course, it must be recalled, also, that there is some $3,500,000,000 worth of agricultural indebtedness which is not included in the farm-mortgage debts; but to offset this, of course, there is the large amount of personal property used for agricultural purposes which in most cases is security for this floating indebtedness.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. On what basis do they determine the valuation of the farm lands?

Mr. HOPE. The figures are compiled by the Department of Agriculture from the reports of the Bureau of the Census, and are included in House Document No. 9, to which I have heretofore referred. I cannot at this time, however, state what basis the Bureau of the Census used in determining the value.

If this 20 percent of mortgage indebtedness which is mentioned above were spread out equally over all the farms of the country, it would constitute much less of a problem than it does today. The great difficulty is that this indebtedness is concentrated on only a part of our farms, and even on this part the distribution is very unequal. The results of a special inquiry made by the Department of Agriculture as of January 1, 1932, indicate that 25 percent of the mortgaged farms of the country are indebted for 25 percent or less of their value; 38 percent were mortgaged for between 25 and 50 percent of their value; 21 percent were mortgaged for between 50 and 75 percent of their value; 11 percent were mortgaged for between 75 and 100 percent of their value; and 5 percent were mortgaged for more than 100 percent of their value. In the time which has intervened since these figures were compiled it is no doubt true there have been some changes in the debt ratio. Nevertheless it is no doubt still true that more than half of the mortgaged farms of the country are mortgaged for less than 50 percent of their value and that more than three fourths of them are mortgaged for less than 75 percent of their value. Any consideration of the ratio of mortgage debt to value would not be complete without pointing out that the proportion of farms with high debt ratios at the time these figures were compiled was largest in the west North Central States, where 8 percent of the mortgaged debtors reported mortgage debts in excess of their farm value, 22 percent in excess of 75 percent of their farm value, and 46 percent equal to more than half of their farm value. These figures further illustrate, of course, that it is the inequality, particularly of the distribution of the farm indebtedness, which makes it such a problem today.

As heretofore stated the average rate of interest on farm mortgages throughout the United States is 6.1 percent. The average rate of interest charged by Federal land banks throughout the United States is 5.5 percent and by joint-stock land banks 5.9 percent. These figures were taken for the year 1928 but are believed to be approximately correct for the present time. As of January 1, 1928, the percentage of farm-mortgage indebtedness held by the Federal land banks was 12½ percent and by the joint-stock land banks 7 percent. The percentage of joint-stock loans is probably somewhat lower at the present time.

The annual amount of interest paid in farm mortgages is now something over $500,000,000. For 1931 it was estimated at $520,000,000.

Now, with these particular figures in mind, I want to point out just what it is intended that this bill shall do. Of course, no one knows how any piece of legislation will work out in actual practice, and the only thing we can do at this time is to point out the theory of the bill and indicate what the results will be if it operates as intended. It is, of course, expected that the $2,000,000,000 in bonds to be issued, bearing 4 percent interest, which interest is guaranteed by the Government, can be sold at par. The bill provides that they shall not carry more than 4 percent interest. If they can be sold at par, carrying a lower interest rate, there is no doubt but that it will be done and the benefits passed on to the borrower. Now, getting down to just what the bill will do, let me first call attention to the fact that it provides that for the next 5 years interest on Federal land-bank loans, both old loans and those made under the provisions of this act, shall not exceed 4½ percent per annum.

Furthermore, that no payment of the principal shall be required during this 5-year period if the borrower is not in default on any of the provisions of the mortgage. This means a flat reduction of 1 percent to the average Federal land-bank borrower together with a moratorium for 5 years upon the amortization payments. Thus we can say for a certainty that the approximately 12 percent of the farm mortgage indebtedness of the country, which is held by the Federal land banks, will have the interest on it reduced on an average of 1 percent, and the borrower will have a 5-year moratorium on any payments of principal.

As far as joint-stock land-bank borrowers are concerned, it is assumed that they will benefit from the provision for loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which loans can only be made upon the agreement of the bank to reduce its interest rate to 5 percent and to agree not to foreclose for a 2-year period except in exceptional circumstances such as abandonment of the land by the owner. Thus, the owners of 6 or 7 percent of the farms in this country which are mortgaged to the joint-stock land banks will receive a reduction in interest of approximately 1 percent and will secure a 2-year moratorium against foreclosures. Therefore, irrespective of how the remainder of the act may work out, I think we can say that there are assured some very definite and concrete benefits which will go to borrowers from the Federal and joint-stock land banks.

However, those are not the borrowers who are in the most distress today, and this bill would be very incomplete indeed if it did not offer other and further relief. I believe that it does. Title I provides that Federal land banks may use the $2,000,000,000 which it is expected will be raised from the sale of bonds to reduce and refinance existing farm mortgages by exchanging bonds for these mortgages or using the proceeds of the bonds to buy outstanding farm mortgages on the best terms possible. When these mortgages are taken over, the land bank will give the borrower the benefit of whatever reduction has been secured in the way of principal and will make a new loan under the terms of the Federal Farm Loan Act at a rate which must not exceed 4½ percent for the first 5 years and with no payments required during that period on the principal. Where local farm-loan associations do not exist, loans may be made direct at a rate not to exceed 5 percent per annum, but the borrower is given the opportunity as soon as there are 10 or more borrowers in any vicinity to cooperate with other borrowers in organizing a farm-loan association, to have his interest reduced to not to exceed 4½ percent. It is the theory that it will be possible in many instances for the Federal land bank to take over mortgages at less than their face value, and in this way the owner will not only secure a reduction in the interest charges which he is paying but in the principal amount of the mortgage as well.

In my opinion, this bill will fall far short of being a success unless it is possible in many cases to scale down the amount of the mortgage indebtedness. Those who have made careful investigation of the matter assure us that in a considerable proportion of cases it will be possible to scale down this indebtedness to a substantial degree. A further and possibly more effective provision for scaling down existing mortgage indebtedness is contained in title 3, which provides for loans totaling $300,000,000 by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation through the Farm Loan Commissioner. These loans may be secured by a first or second mortgage upon the whole or any part of the farm property, both real and personal, including crops, and may be used for the refinancing of farm indebtedness, providing working capital, or to enable a farmer to repurchase or redeem farm property owned and occupied by him as a home and which has been lost through foreclosure within 2 years prior to the enactment of this act or within 2 years after the loss of such home. Loans under this section may be made up to 75 percent of the value of the property, but are limited to $5,000. It is my opinion that this section, if wisely administered, may be used very effectively in the scaling down of farm indebtedness and a refinancing of the same. To give a practical illustration, suppose the case of a farmer who has a farm worth $12,000 and a mortgage on it of $10,000. Under the provisions of the amendment to the Bankruptcy Act, which was passed in the last Congress, or by direct negotiations with the lender he may be able to get the lender to agree to scale down the amount of the mortgage. Under this section he could go to the lender and say, "If you are willing to scale down your $10,000 mortgage to $8,000, I think I can borrow enough through the Farm Loan Commissioner to pay you $2,000 cash and give you a new first mortgage for $6,000, at 4½ percent interest, which is the amount charged now by the Federal land banks. Then the borrower can go to the Farm Loan Commissioner, make application for his $2,000 loan; and inasmuch as this loan, together with the $6,000 first mortgage, will not exceed 75 percent of the value of the land, there is no reason why the Farm Loan Commissioner cannot make it, provided other requirements are met.

The Government will be protected under its second mortgage in these circumstances, because the mortgage holder, before getting this new mortgage for $6,000, must agree to the satisfaction of the Farm Loan Commissioner to limit his right to proceed against the farmer for default in payment of principal. Of course, that is not the only way in which the principal of the farm-mortgage indebtedness might be cut down. It could be done under the provisions of section 2 through a loan direct from the Federal land bank, but those loans are limited to 50 percent of the value of the land plus 20 percent of the value of the insured improvements so that in some cases those provisions would not be of value. Keeping in mind, however, as I heretofore stated, that approximately 63 percent of the mortgaged farms of this country were in 1932 mortgaged for less than 50 percent of the value and that 84 percent were mortgaged for less than 75 percent of their value, it can be seen that under the provisions of both title 1 and title 3 there is an abundant opportunity for a substantial scaling-down of farm indebtedness. In addition to this, the provisions of title 3 give a farmer an opportunity to provide working capital for his farming operations although, personally, I hope that provision of this measure will not be used to increase the long-time indebtedness of agriculture. Rather, I shall consider the bill a great failure if it does not have the effect of reducing the amount of long-time mortgage obligations.

Title 4 of the act provides for loans through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to drainage, levee, irrigation, and similar districts. It might be thought that such a provision has no place in a bill of this kind, but in the opinion of those who have given consideration to the matter it has a direct connection in that in many cases where taxes and assessments for these districts are in default they constitute a prior lien against the land which makes impossible any refinancing. It is the thought that by the medium of these loans some districts may be able to reduce their indebtedness and refinance themselves in such a way as to permit farmers holding land in the districts to take advantage of the provisions of this act and refinance their own farms.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. The basis that the gentleman is giving for loan value, as I understand it under this bill, is, however, based on reappraisal of the property as of the present time. Is not that correct?

Mr. HOPE. It is based on an appraisal at the time the loan is made.

Mr. BRIGGS. That is what I meant. It is not based with reference to a former mortgage indebtedness?

Mr. HOPE. No. It is on the basis of an appraisement which will be made at the time the loan is made.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. Yes.

Mr. SWICK. Will the gentleman tell us how many of these farm mortgages are now in default?

Mr. HOPE. I cannot give the gentleman that information. As far as I know, there is no information upon it. The Federal land-bank mortgages and the joint-stock land-bank mortgages are about 50 percent in default, as I understand it at this time, and I imagine that the same percentage probably holds true of mortgages made by other lending agencies. I have no figure to support that, however.

Mr. SWICK. Has the gentleman any figures as to how many have been foreclosed?

Mr. HOPE. No; I have no figures as to that. In this document I refer to, there are some figures indicating the proportion per 1,000 farms that have been sold under forced sale for several years past. I cannot give those figures just now, but I should be glad to include them in an extension of my remarks.

Mr. SWICK. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STOKES] has those figures.

Mr. STOKES. I understand from the Department of Commerce that approximately 4 percent of the farm mortgages were foreclosed in 1931.

Mr. HOPE. That sounds like a reasonable figure. I think that is in line with the figures that I have here as to the proportion per 1,000 which have been sold under forced sale. The figures above referred to are taken from House Document No. 9 and are as follows:

[1] Including loss of title by default of contract, sales to avoid foreclosure and surrender of title or other transfers to avoid foreclosure.

I may say that in the last 2 years the farm-mortgage indebtedness has been reduced approximately $1,000,000,000, mostly through foreclosure and forced sales or by a scaling-down of the amount of the indebtedness.

Mr. DURGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. Yes.

Mr. DURGAN. The hope is that the scaling down will apply to past-due paper, principally?

Mr. HOPE. Yes; that is naturally where one would expect it to apply most generally, because the man who is paying interest on his mortgage and who has a large equity in his land has not much of a lever with which to get the holder of the mortgage to scale down the amount.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The gentleman is a member of the committee and therefore is familiar with the bill. Does he think the bill as framed will cause any considerable scaling down of farm indebtedness?

Mr. HOPE. I feel there is going to be considerable scaling down. I am basing this opinion very largely upon information that was given to the committee by those who prepared this bill and those who made some study of the farm-mortgage situation.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman point out any provision of the bill that assures the mortgagor of any such scaling down? Is it not entirely voluntary upon the part of the mortgagee, and the situation is not altered in the least? If there is any provision in the bill by which the mortgagor could force a scaling down, I should be delighted to see it.

Mr. HOPE. If the gentleman means whether there is any provision which would force the mortgagee to scale down a mortgage, of course there is no such provision in the bill and this Congress cannot pass any such law.

Mr. PIERCE. Is there any provision anywhere to give the mortgagor any help when he comes to the court of arbitration to ask for a scaling down? If there is, I fail to find it.

Mr. HOPE. Can the gentleman suggest any legislation we could pass which would force a mortgagee to scale down his mortgage—I mean any legislation that would be constitutional?

Mr. PIERCE. I think it could have been done.

Mr. HOPE. Can the gentleman suggest how?

Mr. PIERCE. I think the bill could have been amended.

Mr. HOPE. I did not hear the gentleman offer any amendment in committee which he could have done as a member thereof.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. DOXEY. I do not want to trespass upon the gentleman's time; but in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Oregon, title IV states that in the refinancing of these drainage bonds it will be necessary in the adjustment between the owner of the bond and the man who owes the debt that the average price for 6 months prior to March 1, 1933, shall be the basis of the adjustment. This prevents the owners of the bonds from hiking these bonds up, feeling that because the Government is interested they can get par, whereas they are now selling from 20 to 30 cents on the dollar. That is one of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. That is entirely a provision relating to irrigation districts, not to the joint-stock land banks or to the Federal land banks.

Mr. DOXEY. I was answering the gentleman's question as to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. PIERCE. I see no provision in the bill which will compel any material reducing of the debt.

Mr. HOPE. Let me say there is no provision in the bill that compels the holder of a mortgage to scale down the mortgagor's indebtedness. Any arrangements made along this line will have to be voluntarily arranged between debtor and creditor. In my judgment, Congress cannot pass any bill to compel a creditor to scale down the indebtedness. Of course, a debtor can always take bankruptcy if he wants to go to that extent.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. BRIGGS. As I understand, many of the lenders of money to the farming interests of the United States are rather desperately in need of money themselves now to meet their own obligations, and this bill offers a means, based upon present value, of their getting funds upon this basis. This will mean less, perhaps, than was originally loaned, and it will mean also that the agricultural interests will get the benefit of this reduction. Is this correct?

Mr. HOPE. That is correct, and that is the theory, at least, upon which the provisions of the bill were drawn.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman from New York yield me 5 additional minutes?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I yield the gentleman from Kansas 5 additional minutes.

Mr. DURGAN of Indiana. Will the gentleman kindly explain and interpret the phrase "normal price" as it appeared in the bill?

Mr. HOPE. The word "normal" is not in the bill at the present time. I think the gentleman saw a copy of the bill before it was amended in the committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. Briefly.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Has the gentleman any estimate of how much this scaling down of the debts will amount to, how much salvage there is going to be from the scaling down of these debts?

Mr. HOPE. I do not know how one can get any accurate figure on that because every debt is going to have to stand on its own basis. We had a man appear before the committee, a farmer from Michigan. He told the committee that the party who held a mortgage on his farm had offered to scale it down 40 percent for cash. I do not believe there are many cases where a debt can be scaled down this much, but I do know there must be thousands and thousands of cases where mortgage holders would be glad to get 70 or 80 percent of the amount of their mortgages if they could get it in the form of cash.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I have heard estimates running as high as $1,000,000,000.

Mr. HOPE. I think that is probably within reason.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. HOPE. For a very brief question.

Mr. PIERCE. Is it not true that where the sum is not insufficient the mortgagee will take his pound of flesh?

Mr. HOPE. Naturally. The biggest inducement for the mortgagee to cut down the amount of his mortgage is his own self-interest. If he thinks that he can get more out of his mortgage by taking cash now, if he has more interest in getting cash now and does not want to get the land by letting it go to foreclosure or forced sale, he will naturally be more interested.

The man who, perhaps, has a mortgage which is worth 25 or 30 or even up to 50 percent of the value of the land is not going to be interested in scaling down that mortgage nearly as much as the man who has a mortgage that is worth 75 or 80 percent of the value of the land, and this is a feature which, of course, operates for the benefit of the distressed debtor, because the more distressed he is the more likely it is he can get some relief under the provisions of the bill, assuming he can come within the provisions of title 3, which says the loan must not exceed 75 percent of the value of the security.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Does not the gentleman think that if you dangle in front of that man real cash or Democratic promises, he will grab for the cash? [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPE. I think that is right. I would give almost anyone credit for having that much good judgment.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. HOPE. Yes; briefly.

Mr. BRIGGS. It is perfectly true now that throughout the country many of the holders of these mortgages are themselves seeking moratoriums at the hands of the States and others and that cash to them is far more vital than the acquisition of these farms or the operation of them, which would only give them a lot of frozen assets.

Mr. HOPE. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. BRIGGS. And this, in turn, would be an inducement to utilize this bill to scale down a great deal of the indebtedness in the farming communities.

Mr. HOPE. I do not think there is any question about that.

Now, as I said in the beginning, all of us would like to see more done toward the solving of farm-mortgage problems than can possibly be accomplished under this bill. That does not, however, detract from the fact that this bill has within it the possibilities of accomplishing some very substantial relief. I was very much impressed with the statements of Governor Morgenthau, Dr. Myer, Mr. Bestor, the Farm Loan Commissioner, and Mr. Evans, counsel for the Federal Farm Loan Board, before the Committee on Agriculture. These statements showed a most thorough and careful consideration of the entire farm-mortgage situation and indicated a desire on the part of those who will administer the act to do so in a helpful and sympathetic way. This act alone will not solve the farm problem, but I believe that if as much can be done along the line of reducing farm taxation, of reducing transportation costs, in increasing the price of farm commodities, and in securing a better market for farm products both at home and abroad as this measure may be expected to do in meeting the farm-mortgage situation, that we can well say that substantial progress has been made in agricultural rehabilitation.

I, therefore, see no reason why anyone should refuse to support this bill because it does not do all that he thinks it should do. Rather, I choose to support the bill because of the things I know it will do in solving the farm problem. [Applause.]

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLANNAGAN].

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I am going to support this bill because I think most of its provisions are in the interest of the farmers of this country.

I am indeed sorry that this bill contains section 202. In my opinion, section 202 of this bill is not legislation proposed for the benefit of the farmers of this country, but is purely a bankers' section inserted in this bill for the protection of the stockholders of the joint land banks. I want to give you a picture of just what I believe will happen under section 202 of this bill.

Under section 202 we propose to turn over to the joint land banks $100,000,000 of the taxpayers' money. For what purpose? For the purpose of liquidating the joint land banks. Now, how will this operate? The joint land banks can take $100,000,000 of the taxpayers' money and, in my opinion, buy $300,000,000 of their outstanding bonds; and when they do this we are enabling them to use the taxpayers' money to make a profit of at least $200,000,000.

Mr. HOIDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Yes.

Mr. HOIDALE. Is it not true that the parties who will furnish this money have the right to prescribe the rules and regulations with respect to the use of it?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. I succeeded in getting that amendment added to the bill in committee, but I do not think it will take care of the situation.

Now, what is the situation? When we turn the money over to the joint land banks you will find that the market will be a restricted market. There will only be one purchaser for the joint land bank bonds, and that will be the joint land bank, because the people know these banks are going to be liquidated and no one is going to buy the bonds. You are permitting the joint land banks to hammer these bonds down to 25 cents or 30 cents on the dollar and to reap the profits.

What I think should be done is this: I believe that the farmers of this country should have the right to buy joint land bank bonds and offset these bonds against their paper that the joint land banks hold.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Have not those bonds already advanced 10 points on the strength of this bill?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. These bonds, in view of this legislation, have gone up 10 points, but let me tell the gentleman that the joint-stock land banks of this country have made a profit of over $25,000,000 in the last 2 years by buying their own bonds.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. McGUGIN. I am in full accord with what the gentleman says, and I think it would be a most valuable amendment to this bill if there were a provision whereby the mortgagors could buy these bonds and turn them in against their indebtedness, but due to the abominable gag rule passed yesterday we cannot offer any such amendment, can we?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. We are unable to get an amendment offered on the floor.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. On the constitutional question discussed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] a moment ago, the gentleman stated there is no constitutional way by which we could provide that such a benefit could be passed on to the mortgagor. Could it not have been passed on by providing that the joint-stock land bank should not be supplied with money to purchase these bonds unless it passed the benefit on, the same as we provided that it had to cut its interest down, and would not that be constitutional?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Let me say to the gentleman that the Banking and Currency Committee passed on that very question and reported that it could be done within constitutional limitations. Under the present law the joint-stock land banks can go out and buy these bonds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Under the present law the joint land banks can go out and buy their own bonds and substitute the bonds for any paper they choose held by the trustee in trust for the benefit of the bondholders. When you extend the right of substitution to the mortgagors over the country what are you doing? You are broadening the bond market, you are bringing into existence thousands of bond buyers, and under the present law you have only one buyer of the bonds of the joint land bank, and that is the bank itself.

Let me give you the picture of the present set-up of these joint land banks.

The joint land banks hold farmers' paper in the sum of about $460,000,000. Against that paper they have outstanding in bonds $430,000,000. This gives them an equity of $30,000,000. You turn over the $100,000,000 to them and then what will be the set-up? They will take the $100,000,000 and buy $300,000,000 of bonds, and their liability will then be $130,000,000 to the bondholders and $100,000,000 to the Government, and what will their assets be? They will still have $460,000,000 in the form of assets. So they have made a profit of $200,000,000, and that is only the first step. Let me give you the second step.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Was all this information which the gentleman is giving us available to the committee when it framed the bill?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. It was available, and I fought over this matter with the committee for several days.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman kindly state to us what provision he would add to the bill to give the mortgagors the advantages he speaks of?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Before I do that let me give you the second set-up. They have a profit of $200,000,000. You will find that over 50 percent of this mortgage paper held by the joint land banks is good paper—that is, paper on which no default has been made on either the interest or installment payments. The presumption is that the paper is worth 100 cents on the dollar.

By this bill they can take half of the notes, which we all know to be good, take them to the Federal land bank and get $230,000,000 in cash. Then what will they do? They will take $100,000,000 of the money and pay off the Government loan and use the other $130,000,000 to buy up the balance of the bonds, and if they had to then pay dollar for dollar for the bonds they would have enough money.

After this is done the joint land banks would have left $230,000,000 in mortgage paper, which will give them a paper profit of $200,000,000.

Under this bill the farmers are not being benefited, the bondholders are being robbed out of their bonds, and the only beneficiary will be the stockholders in the joint-stock land banks. Let me tell you why, in my opinion, the effort is being made by the joint land banks to put this section through. There is a double liability on the stockholders in the joint-stock land banks, the same liability that exists under the national banking law, and this is an effort on behalf of the stockholders of the joint-stock land banks, and these banks are all insolvent, to not only save themselves harmless from loss but to make their stock worth over par.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 5 minutes outside of the time allotted for general debate. This is the most informative talk that I have heard on this bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the time has been fixed by the House, and the Committee cannot change that. I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Let me in that brief time try to answer the inquiry propounded as to how we can save the farmers of America. Here is the way you can do it. Give them the right to buy the bonds at 30 or 40 cents on the dollar, whatever the market price is, and then give them the right of substitution. Give them the right to take the bonds to the joint-stock land banks and get their paper in exchange. When you do this, you will help both the bondholders and farmers. What will be the result? You will then have an active bond market for these bonds, which will put the bonds up. You will have every farmer in America who has given a mortgage to the joint-stock land banks bidding on the bonds, and this will help the bondholders, and you will help the farmers by giving them the right to buy the bonds and exchange same for their mortgage notes.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. That is just the ordinary law of counterclaim.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Absolutely; and the law of counterclaim applies whether the claim is due or not due in the case of insolvency.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Is it not a fact that the attorneys of the land banks proposed this plan because they said as these bonds were not due the farmer who bid them in could not require the bank to accept them in discharge of his obligation?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. That is what they say, but the Supreme Court of the United States has held otherwise in case of insolvency. In case of insolvency you can set off a matured obligation against one that has not matured, and every one of these banks is insolvent, and the bill admits their insolvency and says that we are turning over the $100,000,000 to the banks in order that they may liquidate.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Yes.

Mr. PIERCE. In the bill we provide that before they take advantage, they have to give the mortgagor 1 percent reduction in his interest. Why could they not have been obliged to give the same reduction to the mortgagor that the market for the bonds or the stock they purchased would give?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. I say that section 202 is not a farmer's bill but is a banker's bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes. I was very much taken with the ideas suggested by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLANNAGAN], because I would like to see that course of procedure adopted, but the legal counsel which the committee had available advised us that the courts had decided that you could not offset a nondue obligation against a due obligation, because in financing a bank or any other institution the purpose of its borrowing money is usually to get immediate operating funds. They advised us that the courts had uniformly held that those offsets could not be made. I then asked, as members of the committee will remember, whether we could not then require them to accept these bonds on deferred obligations or installments, and they again said that the bondholders having an interest in those banks had a right to prevent an offset of a nondue obligation against a due obligation. Here was the main purpose in giving it out. These banks are to be liquidated.

Regardless of what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLANNAGAN] said, if he will take the present status of the banks into consideration, he will see that those stockholders are not going to make any money out of this. There does not seem to be a chance in the world for that, at least not unless there should be a great increase in the farm price level all along the line. Otherwise there is much more likelihood of an assessment.

Here is a danger in these matters. If farmers should go out and buy some of these bonds in the expectation that they could tender them, and then if it were knocked out by the courts, we would have a great deal of grief. These joint-stock land banks are going to be liquidated, and nobody is going to make any money out of them. I understand that one of the States undertook to pass just such a law, and some farmers and others anticipating, went out and got some of the bonds and were much disappointed when their hopes were not realized. It is hoped that this bill will be of great advantage to the farmers. It would not seem wise to take a chance on having an illegal provision in the bill. I wish it might be done. It might be written in as a condition to future issues, in which event it could be made effective.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Does the gentleman controvert the proposition that an obligation that has matured may be offset against one that has not matured in the case of insolvency?

Mr. JONES. I have not had a chance to look up those decisions, but they all tell me you could not do it in those cases. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. DARDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. DARDEN. Why is it necessary to include the $100,000,000 in this bill when it does not grant any relief to the farmers that is not given in the following section?

Mr. JONES. Oh, it states that they must reduce the interest for the life of the loan from 6 percent to 5 percent.

Mr. DARDEN. The bill says 2 years.

Mr. JONES. No. It is for the whole life of the loan. Then it also provides that they shall not foreclose for a period of 2 years.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. McGUGIN. Granting that under the ordinary rules of law you could not offer a nondue debt as a counterclaim for a due debt, yet we could put this provision in the bill that as a condition to their receiving this $100,000,000 they would have to agree to that.

Mr. JONES. Well, I took that particular question up, hoping that that might be done, and they still said that the banks borrow the money and any outstanding bondholder could object to that procedure and could bring an injunction proceeding to stop it. I did not want to complicate the bill. I would like to see it done myself, but I do not want to take a chance on having the bill declared unconstitutional.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] has again expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from "out where the tall corn grows" [Mr. GILCHRIST].

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I have supported practically all progressive and remedial legislation that has been offered in the last two sessions of this Congress. We have now come to the question of farm-mortgage relief, and something has been said about helping the home owners. Why should not the farmers help the home owners to save their homes? Of course they should. I want to help them as well. I have been voting for the whole agricultural program, for the tobacco fields and cotton fields of the South and the beet fields of the West and the potato fields of the North. Why not? The time has now come for us to help all of our people who are oppressed by farm mortgages, and we ought not to be sectional. We will go along with you and we want you to go along with us. This bill is not going to do as much good as I have tried to get and have hoped to get for the farmers of Iowa, and the cornfields of our State.

I regret exceedingly the adoption of the rule under which this bill must be considered whereby we cannot amend it in the slightest particular. My friends on the other side of the aisle have made a most serious mistake in refusing to allow amendments. The bill is not sacrosant. Although the bill has glaring defects, we cannot remedy it. Those of us who have been joining with you in farm-relief measures are not to be allowed to make a single change in the meaning or even the language of the bill. Cannot you trust the vast majority that you have here? There does not seem to be a single Member of this Congress who has spoken about the bill or who has talked about it either in committee or out of committee who thinks the bill is just exactly what it ought to be. Every one of us wants to amend it, and I am convinced that a majority is ready to agree upon some very helpful amendments if they could be allowed to do so. But the gag rule is on. Ever since I have been here I have tried to do away with gag rules. I want to liberalize the rules so that the Government will be returned to the people's representatives and not be left in the hands of an oligarchy. I have tried to get roll calls so that the people would know exactly what their representatives are doing. And now this piece of legislation comes on without a single chance to amend it or change it or rewrite it so that it would really repair the devastation that burdensome farm mortgages has wrought to the agricultural people of this country. I was one of those who signed and helped to write the minority report which points out glaring defects and suggests amendments to remedy them.

The bill will not do the good that it ought to do for my district and State. If it does some good, no matter how small it may be, I shall feel justified in voting for it. If it lightens their heavy load, even in a small degree, we should be for it. But now is the time and here is the place to grant real relief to our farmers, and you are not doing it. You are shirking your duty. The bill will probably permit a few crumbs or morsels to fall from Dives' table into the lap of our bankrupt farmers. But the bill will prove to be a great disappointment to our farm people, because they are asking for real help and you are not giving more than secondary assistance.

I want first to talk about the subject of offsets which has just been mentioned by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLANNAGAN] and by the chairman of the committee [Mr. JONES]. As I have said, I was one of those who signed the minority report, and if you will read it you will discover that we discussed this very question. Ever since I have been here I have been receiving letters from farmers in distress saying, "Why do you not allow us to buy at cheap current prices the bonds of the Federal land banks and joint-stock land banks and then offset them against our debts?" I have uniformly replied, saying that I was for their proposition, but that there was doubt as to the constitutionality of such a measure, for the reasons pointed out by the chairman, and because a debt actually due cannot be offset with a nondue debt. When I sue you upon a debt that is due you cannot offset against me a debt that is not due for 20 years. That seems to be fundamental.

But, Mr. Chairman, section 2 of this bill provides for certain things to be done in the interest of the banks. It provides that they shall receive certain favors. If they want to get these favors, they can be required to give what the lawyers call a "consideration" for them. There are already two propositions in the bill that they must comply with before they can get this $100,000,000 appropriation. Page 14 of the bill sets them out, and says that they must first grant to each borrower 5 percent interest per annum; and, secondly, they must agree to a moratorium for a period of 2 years. Now, I want to state the position of my chairman fairly. Let me say that he is a wonderful chairman and is most fair and courteous in his treatment to all of us, both on the floor and in the committee; but that does not mean that we must always agree with him. It is true that in the committee the general counsel for the Farm Loan Bureau was asked about this right of counterclaim or offset. He gave it as his opinion that Congress could not in an outright manner require the banks to grant that right. But he did not say that the banks cannot be required to do so as a consideration for the benefits and favors that are given to them. It is admitted that we can compel these banks to cut down the interest rate in order to get these favors. It is admitted that we can compel them to grant a moratorium against foreclosures for 2 years in order to get the benefits that we are awarding to them; and I assert without any fear of successful contradiction that for the same reasons we can lawfully and constitutionally require them to admit the right of offset or counterclaim in order to get the $100,000,000 appropriation so generously provided for them in the bill.

The distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLANNAGAN] pointed out how under this bill enormous profits will be made by the joint-stock land-bank system. I firmly believe he is right, and that the bill favors the joint-stock land banks as much at least or more than it does our farmers. It is a bankers' bill.

The attorney before the committee did say that many of these mortgages are put up as collateral into the hands of a trustee whom he called a registrar, and that that registrar holds those mortgages for the payment of the joint-stock land-bank bonds; but, after all, the registrar is human by whatsoever name he may be called, and the banks can be given the choice of accepting or refusing the provisions of the bill. If the banks are in the hands of a receiver, the court will undoubtedly have the right to command the situation, and the court can say to his registrar or to his receiver that he must come in under the terms of this bill and accept the conditions on page 14, numbered 1 and 2. We can also put in a third condition. There does not seem to be anybody who cares to dispute that, so far as a court receivership is concerned, and without a court receivership, undoubtedly it can be done.

Believe me that these banks will be eager to sign up for the benefits and the appropriations. They will be glad to line up at the counter when the pie is distributed. Do not forget that! Now, our proposition is a simple one. They want the benefits—let them comply with the conditions. If they want the gift of a horse, let them not look the horse in the mouth. And in passing around these gifts why not let the farmer get some of them? Why not give him some of the benefits? Let us not lose this opportunity to benefit the man whose home is being sold by the sheriff. The chance will not come again. Let us seize it now and amend the bill accordingly.

These bonds of the joint-stock land system are worth 20 percent, 30 percent, and so on, and I shall not go over the matter again, except to call attention to the statements in the minority report, as follows:

Fourth. The bill renders many favors to the joint-stock land banks and Federal land banks and as consideration therefor they should be required to correct some abuses now prevalent. It is well known that the avarice and cupidity of some of these banks impel them to foreclose and secure title to the land and then sell it and invest the proceeds in their own bonds, which they can buy at a mere fraction of par. In this way they reduce their own indebtedness and make enormous profits out of their foreclosure to the serious disadvantage of the mortgagor. We think that provisions should be made to check this evil and to allow the mortgagors to present these same bonds, either in whole or in part, in payment of or as an offset or counter claim to the mortgage debt. Many well-advised persons say with reason that Congress heretofore has not had constitutional power to require this right of offset to be given to the mortgagor without the consent of the bank. This opinion is based upon the belief that Congress cannot require a person to accept his own obligation which is not yet due in payment of a debt to him which in fact is already due and matured. But now at the time of the passage of this bill the legal situation is changed and an opportunity is given Congress to enact an amendment wherein the right of offset would be specifically provided and whereby the banks would be required, within limitations and safeguards, to grant the right of offset as a consideration for the privileges and benefits contained in this bill. Such an amendment would be both proper and legal and constitutional, and the present opportunity to enact it ought not be lost.

I regret that the gag rule is on and that our friends consider the bill as sacrosant and will not allow us to amend it in other particulars. I should like to give the farmer much more than he really gets from this legislation. We all know that he needs it. In the past 2 years farm values throughout the whole United States have decreased $14,000,000,000. Last year farm values decreased $9,000,000,000. The farmers' income during the last 2 years has decreased from about $12,000,000,000 yearly to about $5,000,000,000 last year.

We should get the real facts regarding the farm-mortgage situation before us in order that we can apply existing conditions to this bill and learn to what extent it will benefit our people. Last year our agriculture college studied the agricultural emergency in Iowa, and in January 1933 it made a report on the Iowa farm-mortgage situation. I learn from this report that in October 1932 the farm-mortgage debt in my State stood at about $1,083,000,000. This debt had grown sevenfold during the 32 years of the present century. That report shows that in October last year 45 percent of the farms in the State were under mortgage. The estimated mortgage debt per acre stood at $71. I may say that this agrees very strikingly with a letter on the farm-debt problem transmitted about 2 weeks ago by our distinguished and beloved Secretary of Agriculture, himself a native Iowan, in response to House Resolution No. 79. I want to talk about the average farmer and the average loan in Iowa as based upon these figures. I want to discover just how much help the bill will give the Iowa farmer who has a mortgage of $71 per acre upon his land.

I believe the bill may help some of our farmers who do not stand in average relationship to the Iowa farm-mortgage situation. But it cannot do the good it ought to do for the vast number of them who owe these mortgages and who own 45 percent of the land. I insist on this because I want to lay the foundation for real honest-to-goodness farm-mortgage relief. Until about a year ago the farm-mortgage debt was $75 per acre and about 50 percent of all of the farms within the State were mortgaged. But the sheriff has been selling these lands at the front door of the courthouse, and the poor farmers have been giving quitclaim deeds to their homes and the figures have been cut down as I have indicated.

It is a woeful thing to have the sheriff sell your home. Through no fault of the farmer, a writ is issued and the sheriff is directed to dispossess and throw out into the highway the farmer and his wife and children. A sheriff's sale is a wicked thing, but a writ of eviction is worse. The old homestead is sold, and the folks can step out into the snows and ice and blizzards of an Iowa winter or else accept a new economic status. They can become peasants. They can become tenants with all of the evils of the landlord system dictating their position and their activities.

If this bill is to do the amount of good which I have hoped to get for a distracted people, then the rate of interest must be less than 4½ percent. That is the interest rate named in the bill, and the amortization payments on the principal are to be added on top of that. How pitiful the prospect must be for a farmer who has an acre of corn land in Iowa which grew him an average of 40 bushels of corn, which in many places was sold last year at the disgraceful figure of 8 cents a bushel. Think of it! This would give him an income of $3.20 per acre on his corn land.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. In a neighboring town not far from where I live one of the poorer varieties of corn was quoted this winter at 2 cents per bushel, with an asterisk against the quotation, which meant that if it was on the cob the price would be 2 cents less.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Thanks. Did the farmer have to throw in a shoat or a dozen eggs as a premium? I have already told Congress the story about the man in my home county who shelled his mortgagee's corn in order to get the cobs. Why, they are burning corn in Iowa, yet the miners of Iowa and Illinois are going hungry for food. Well, suppose that my good farmer gets $3.20 per acre for his corn and that his mortgage is in the average sum of $71 per acre. Do you know how this figures out? The interest on the mortgage at the rate named in the bill figures at $3.19½ per acre, so that the corn farmer, thank the Lord, has a profit above his interest of one half of 1 cent per acre for his cornfield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Does the gentleman think many farmers having mortgages on their land will be able to get any benefit from this bill?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I am coming to that. I should like to discuss the rate of interest at the present time.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I cannot yield; my time is limited and I have many things to direct attention to. And while talking about interest remember that the bill provides that the farmer gets only $95 out of a $100 loan. He must invest the other $5 in a farm-loan association. This is a feature of the present law which is continued by the bill; but it should not be, because it is objectionable. The mortgagors do not understand the set-up. They misunderstand it. It is a source of discontent and is the basis of false hopes, false representations, and promises. If permitted, I would strike it out of the bill.

I would also amend the interest rates and make them much lower than the bill exacts. Under present condition 4½ percent as pure interest without amortization is too high. A bushel of wheat will pay the interest on less than $7. A bushel of corn at last winter's rates would have paid interest on $2 of principal only. There is not much relief in the interest rates which Uncle Sam is giving his boys in this bill. And the rate is very little less than the average rate now charged in Iowa. The report from the Iowa State Agricultural College above referred to shows that the average interest rate on farm mortgages in Iowa was about 5½ percent in 1920 and it was only 5.53 percent in 1930, and in many instances was as low as the rate named in this bill. Why should money rates be so high and rates for human toil so low? When we profess that we are giving cheap rates to destitute farmers who are trying to save their homes, we ought at least to make the rates as cheap as we do to some of the "big boys" in control of financial affairs.

The last 90-day certificates sold by the Treasury were vastly oversubscribed at seventy-seven one hundredths of 1 percent interest. Two percent interest has attracted hundreds of millions of dollars into the Postal Savings accounts of the Government. We give outright subsidies to some enterprises. We loan money to shipping interests engaged in foreign trade at rates running as low as 1¼ percent. And most of these rates are along about 2⅝ percent or 2⅞ percent. Some of the cooperatives pay only one eighth of 1 percent interest. Some grape growers get loans from the Government at one eighth of 1 percent. Duck growers pay as low as one half of 1 percent, while the cherry growers pay three eighths of 1 percent. I do not know why a cherry-grower should get his money so cheap, but I suppose we should have cheap maraschinoes for the cocktails that the "big boys" drink.

The Government cut down the debts of the foreign nations manyfold and then contracted to take very cheap rates of interest for the remainder. Italy was to pay 1.13 percent interest and France 2.16 percent interest, and they were to be paid over a period of 62 years and the principal itself was to be canceled. The foreign debts were to pay an average of only 2.62 percent. Here again is a matter for amendment. We ought to make a cheaper rate of interest available to farm-home owners.

Mr. Chairman, the amount fixed in the bill at which we are allowed to refinance these mortgages is entirely too small. This was pointed out in the minority report and by the virile, energetic, and eloquent gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU]. Under the bill the most a farmer can get is 50 percent of the value of the land and 20 percent of the value of the improvements. This will nowhere equal $71 per acre, which is the average of the Iowa mortgage. The value of the good land and the improvements there will amount to at least $75 to $100 per acre. Figure it out on this basis and assume that the buildings are worth about one quarter of the land itself and you will find that the bill will raise only $42.50 per acre on $100 land and $31.87 on $75 land. Nobody is going to scale down his mortgage to that extent. What insurance company is going to take $42.50 for a piece of property that is worth $100? What bank will accept $32 instead of a mortgage for $75? You can take your slate and pencil and figure until doomsday and not be able to arrive at satisfactory figures on this point. Friends of the bill talk about scaling down the mortgages, but human nature is the same now as it always has been, and unless revolutionary methods are adopted—and we hope they never will be adopted—and unless the farmers are compelled to resort to force, intimidation, and even violence, which we hope they will not be compelled to do, the mortgages will never be scaled down in these cases where the land is worth more than the mortgage. They will never be scaled down in those cases where the personal liability of the mortgagor is ample even though the land is worth less than the mortgage. And in those cases where the land is worth less than the mortgage, and where also the personal liability is bad, the mortgagee will come to a composition with the mortgagor. If he does not, then chapter 8 of the new bankruptcy law, which we recently passed relating to agricultural compositions or extensions, will be brought into the situation and relief can then be given under that law. It is fair to say in this connection that there will probably be some cases, at least a few cases, where this bill will do some good. But I am appealing to you and begging that the bill be so changed as to help the average man and the average farmer in the communities covered by the study which our agricultural college made last year. Let me implore you to give these farmers the relief which they so sadly require.

Perhaps the bill will help some situations. Perhaps it will help some localities. But it ought to be made over so as to help the average man in the average condition who holds an average relationship to the farm-mortgage problem. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr .CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I cannot yield. I have not told half what I want to tell. It is not because I do not want to be courteous but because I have not the time.

I noticed in one of my home papers the other day that a mortgage went on record showing a loan of $2,100,000,000 from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Lincoln Joint Stock Land Bank, covering farms which it had taken over. The article states that the property used as security consisted of real estate the Lincoln bank has gained possession of through foreclosures. It surely can make a killing with this $2,100,000,000 by going out and buying its own bonds at cheap prices, thereby retiring its own debts at face values and at little cost to the bank.

In another paper I read a news dispatch by the United Press published yesterday as follows:

WIDE-SPREAD REVOLT IS PREDICTED AMONG MIDWEST FARMERS

CHICAGO.—A wide-spread farm revolt in which rich milk will be poured into hog troughs and grain and produce will be stored in the fields while city markets clamor for food was predicted today.

The forecast was contained in a report to the League for Justice to Agriculture made by Arthur E. Holt and Carl R. Hutchinson after a trip through Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Iowa, during which they made a survey of farm-protest groups.

The league is an organization of clerics embracing all faiths. Holt is a theological professor.

In their report entitled "Emerging Agrarian Protest Movements in the Northwest", they listed several protest groups investigated and concluded that "we have in these spontaneous uprisings of various kinds an emerging class-conscious farmer revolt. It can be understood on no other basis."

Plans are outlined, they said, for a general "strike" to begin May 13 if farm legislation enacted by May 3 fails to guarantee "cost of production" to the agriculturist.

I want to say to you that the farmers ought to have cost of production. [Applause.] They ought to have cost of production just the same as there ought not to be any sweatshops where men and women for disgraceful pittance are engaged in making shirts. Human flesh and human labor and human blood ought not to be cheapened. Anybody who wants to eat ought to be willing to pay the cost of production. Furthermore you have no right to eat unless and until you pay the man who produces your food what it costs him to produce it. I am for any bill which will establish that principle. I believe that whoever works should be paid fairly for his labor, that the laborer is worthy of his hire, and that the farmer should have just recompense for the food that he lays upon the dinner tables of the United States of America. Why not? Is there anything wrong or immoral about that?

With respect to this matter I call attention to the fact that there are now in this city many men and women who are interested in the farm situation, who are begging that you will allow them, somehow or other, to get the cost of production. I believe they have the right to publish their plight to the country and to ask that justice be done to them as laborers in the fields and producers upon the farms, and to assert their right as free men and free women to an equal opportunity to live in America with their families in a condition commensurate with their labors and with their contributions to society.

I know full well that industry and banking and commerce must be taken care of. I am willing to go along in that respect. I want to see the factories made prosperous and the laborers given work, but the fundamental thing just now is for us to see to it that the homes and farms of our food-producers shall be saved to them and their families.

In one part of my State it is said that 1 farm out of every 7 has been foreclosed. In addition there are probably twice as many more where the claims of the mortgagee were settled by voluntary arrangement outside of court. There have been an unprecedented number of sheriff sales. However, the sheriffs are not doing this as much as they used to do for two reasons. One is that the mortgagee has found out that it does not do any good to take these farms and homes away from the people, because when he gets them he does not know what to do with them. Then again some of the lawyers for these mortgagees are not very enthusiastic just now about going out to these communities in order to attend foreclosure proceedings and to get the decrees and writs under which the sheriff can sell. A great deterrent has been administered to this bunch of lawyers. In an adjoining congressional district the irate farmers met such a lawyer recently on the steps at the front door of the courthouse and persuaded him—let us hope by fair means—not to go forward with the processes of eviction.

I may state here that I believe the farmers want to be law-abiding citizens and that they will be law-abiding, but in cases where they have been at no fault they will not stand to be thrown out of their homes without exhausting every means for protection. They are desperate. Let us give them hope and provide lawful means for the redress of pitiable conditions in the Corn Belt, as well as elsewhere in our fair land.

I wish the bill could be amended, but I will vote for it in the belief that it will do some good, that in certain localities it may do much good, that in all localities there may be instances where it will help some poor distressed farmer. I express these sentiments and criticisms in the hope that thereby those who administer the provisions of this bill will be brought to a more liberal interpretation of the act and give relief to those entitled to have relief.

The minority report is right. It points the way to better farm-mortgage relief. It shows that the present bill will not give adequate relief, that it will prove to be a disappointment, that it contains many objectionable features such as those already spoken of; it points out that we should not at this time issue more tax-exempt and interest-bearing bonds. We have need for more currency and more bank credit. But we will not come to a sound basis for a financial rehabilitation until we learn that there are four factors in price fixing and not two only, as is commonly supposed. We hear men talk about supply and demand as being the only two things that fix prices. As is stated by Prof. G. F. Warren, of Cornell University, we must come to believe that there are four factors in fixing the price of any commodity: The price of wheat, for example, is the ratio of the (1) supply of wheat and the (2) demand for it to the (3) supply of gold and the (4) demand for it.

I will conclude by saying that the farmer is now required to pay his mortgage with dollars that are altogether too high priced and that are wholly out of proportion with the dollars that he borrowed. He is required to give too much of his produce and his labor in order to pay that mortgage. He is just as honest, and just as industrious, and just as capable as he ever was, but he cannot meet his debts under present prices for his products. This leads him to despair. He sees his wife and his children suffering. Under present prospects he cannot even hope to give them those things which will allow them to live in common comfort and make them useful and respected members of society. Through no fault of his he realizes that want and suffering are about to engulf them. He feels the horrors of humiliation and disgrace that are to overwhelm him. He now makes this last appeal to Congress not as a mendicant begging for alms but as a proud American citizen he asks for justice so that he may be protected against a flood of circumstances which have engulfed him through no fault of his own but through unwise and unfair economic regulations, all of which must be brought into just relationship with the conditions that surround him. And here he will make his last stand politically, economically, and actually. [Applause.]

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, no Member of the House is more deeply interested in legislation to refinance farm mortgages than I am. Born on a farm, I was, of course, in intimate touch with farm life until I grew to young manhood. Since that time I have unfortunately owned too much farm land and think I have kept in close and sympathetic touch with every phase of farm life and believe I have some practical knowledge of farm conditions. I represent an agricultural district. Everyone in my district is dependent upon farming, whether he lives in the country, a city, or town, and whether he is a farmer, merchant, laborer, banker, or professional man. Their prosperity depends upon the success of the farmers.

Everyone appreciates that the price of everything the farmer produces has fallen far below the cost of production. Wheat brought to the farmer around threshing time as low as 30 cents per bushel, oats around 12 cents per bushel, cotton 6 cents per pound, corn around 15 cents per bushel, and all other farm products, including livestock, far below the cost of production. The farmers cannot live and pay farm upkeep and taxes, and send their children to school at these prices. In the meantime the taxes on farm lands have increased. However, the State and local authorities are solely responsible for the ad valorem taxes on farm lands. These taxes should be lowered through finding other sources of taxation.

As a result of bad economic conditions the farmers have been unable to pay their taxes or their mortgage burdens, and as a result schools have been closed or their terms shortened.

The farmers have lost their purchasing power. These bad conditions have affected the economic life of the Nation and more severely every community where farming is the basic industry.

The farm problem has been discussed at every crossroads store, on the streets, in the press, and in every public forum, including the House of Representatives, for the past few years.

The recent bulletin prepared under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, dated March 7, 1933, estimates the farm-mortgage indebtedness at about $8,500,000,000, and the short-term indebtedness of the farmers at about $3,500,000,000. This bulletin states:

> The total farm indebtedness of all kinds probably amounts to over $12,000,000,000.

The bulletin states that somewhat more than 40 percent of the farms in this country are mortgaged. It further states:

> About 30 percent of the volume of outstanding farm mortgages is held by individuals, 23 percent by insurance companies, 19 percent by Federal and joint-stock land banks, 11 percent by commercial banks, 10 percent by mortgage companies, and 7 percent by other firms or agencies.

The annual interest charge on outstanding farm mortgages is estimated for 1932 at approximately $500,000,000. I think this estimate too conservative. The total annual interest charge against farmers on all classes of debts, including interest on mortgages on farms held by nonfarmers, is estimated to be approximately $900,000,000. The annual property tax on all farm property was estimated at about $777,000,000 in 1929. The gross farm income for 1919 was estimated at $17,000,000,000, whereas for 1932 this income had been reduced to about $5,000,000,000.

Mortgages have been foreclosed on farms at an alarming rate during the past few years, and these foreclosures are gradually increasing in numbers. In some counties and communities it is estimated that 65 percent of the farms are held in foreign ownership and are being occupied and cultivated by tenant farmers. Commercial banks in agricultural communities have failed in large numbers, and in the remaining banks deposits have been greatly reduced. The total number of bank failures since 1920 has reached the startling total of 11,000—all due to bad business conditions and largely to the distressed condition of the farmers.

Insurance companies have had heavy demands for loans from policyholders and have recently been forced to discourage the making of new farm loans.

In this connection I invite attention to a table, prepared under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, which gives an estimate of farm mortgages held January 1, 1928, by various institutions and companies and individuals:

Lending agencies	Percentage held by each agency	Amount held by each agency
	Percent
Federal land banks	12.1	$1,146,000,000
Joint-stock land banks	7.0	667,000,000
Commercial banks	10.8	1,020,000,000
Mortgage companies	10.4	988,000,000
Insurance companies	22.9	2,164,000,000
Retired farmers	10.6	1,006,000,000
Active farmers	3.6	339,000,000
Other individuals	15.4	1,453,000,000
Other agencies	7.2	685,000,000
Total	100.0	9,468,000,000

In explanation of the figures in the above table, which was made up as of January 1, 1928, the Department of Agriculture insists that the amount of farm mortgages which have been paid off or foreclosed totals about $1,000,000,000, leaving, in round numbers, at present approximately $8,500,000,000 of indebtedness secured by farm mortgages outstanding.

Life-insurance companies, considered as a group, are the largest holders of farm mortgages, their holdings representing nearly 23 percent of the total. Federal land banks are second in importance, holding 12 percent of the total. Individuals are stated to hold about 30 percent of these farm mortgages.

The farmers are being driven from their homes, farm improvements are greatly depreciating in value, the soil is eroding, and everyone appreciates that the purchasing power of the farmers has been reduced to the vanishing point and that it is necessary to enact some legislation to refinance farm mortgages.

Having briefly stated but not having overdrawn the situation, we come now to a consideration of the pending bill.

No one can be more deeply in sympathy with the purposes of the bill than I am. Since I have been in the House, as to legislation affecting the farmers, every vote I have cast has been in their interest. I have given the best study of which I am capable to a careful analysis of this bill.

Let us analyze the bill in detail. It has four titles.

TITLE I

Title I provides for amending the Federal Farm Loan Act by authorizing the issuance of bonds by Federal land banks for the purpose of making loans or exchanging bonds for mortgages, as provided in paragraph second of section 13 of the act, in an amount not in excess of $2,000,000,000. The interest, which is to be guaranteed by the Government of the United States, is fixed at a rate not in excess of 4 percent per annum.

The principal, as well as the interest, should have been guaranteed, which would have resulted in their being sold at a lower rate of interest and resulting to the benefit of the farmers. In fact, I cannot see how we can guarantee the interest on long-term bonds without guaranteeing the principal.

Title I, of course, will be of material assistance to those farmers who have secured their loans through the Federal land banks and to those farmers to whom loans in the future may be made by these banks.

It will be noted that the Department of Agriculture reports outstanding mortgages held by Federal land banks in the sum of $1,146,000,000. It will therefore be seen that while the Federal land banks and the joint-stock land banks are jointly estimated to hold 19 percent of the farm mortgages outstanding, the Government guarantees the interest, under the terms of this bill, on $2,000,000,000 of Federal land-bank bonds.

In other words, the greatest, or major part of the benefit which this emergency bill confers will be largely through the Federal land banks. I think equal legislative consideration should be given all classes who are holders of real-estate mortgages, including individuals, commercial banks, mortgage companies, insurance companies, and other mortgage owners.

Section 2 of title I authorizes the refinancing, purchase, or exchange of bonds for outstanding first mortgages up to 50 percent of the normal value of the land mortgaged and appraised and 20 percent of the value of the permanent insured improvements. This is the existing law. This provision will give an outlet to mortgages held by agencies other than farm land banks through these banks.

Sympathetically administered, I think the various sections under title I would authorize the Federal land banks to refinance distressed mortgages outstanding, whether held by the Federal land banks or joint-stock land banks themselves, by commercial banks, mortgage companies, insurance companies, retired farmers, individuals, or other agencies; but the people whom I represent and the farmers generally who have mortgages upon their farm lands, by whomsoever held, want to be assured that through some provision of this bill, and particularly title I, they may be refinanced in cases where mortgages are due or in process of or threatened with foreclosure. They will immediately write every Member of Congress for information as to how to proceed. They will want a definite answer. I want to be able to give it to them.

Title I refers to Federal land banks exclusively, and provides for securing the funds through the sale of bonds—the interest on the bonds being guaranteed by the Government—to the extent of $2,000,000,000. Very well; this will insure a limited amount for the benefit of the Federal land banks. We must remember that these banks are largely owned by individual borrowers who have taken stock in them since they were organized under the act of July 17, 1916. Under the report made by the Secretary of Agriculture Federal land banks have outstanding $1,146,000,000 in mortgage loans. How can we safely assure and guarantee to the distressed mortgagors who have made mortgages to these various other agencies and who are being pressed for payment and threatened with foreclosure that they can go to the Federal land banks and be assured of being refinanced by the Federal land banks, whose stock at present is held by individual borrowers, officered by directors elected by them?

For that reason in my study of the mortgage situation I prepared a bill, H.R. 3209, creating in the place of Federal land banks a new agency, Federal rural mortgage land banks, whose capital stock would be entirely subscribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and all of the officers appointed by the Government and therefore under the complete control of the Government. This bill which I prepared would give practically the same authority to Federal rural mortgage land banks as given in this bill to Federal land banks except that the funds would be adequate to refinance mortgages made by any individual, company, corporation, or other agency.

I do not feel safe in saying that the amount of bonds, the interest on which is guaranteed up to $2,000,000,000, will be adequate, but the hope is expressed in the bill that Federal land banks will thereafter be able to sell their 4-percent tax-exempt bonds at par and therefrom secure sufficient additional funds to make to all distressed mortgagors. This is the crux of the situation.

Title III affords relief to the amount of $300,000,000, administered through the Farm Loan Commissioner to distressed mortgagors, which I will discuss later.

Section 3 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, in the event of the extension of loans by the Federal land banks, to subscribe to the paid-in surplus of such banks an amount equal to the amount of all such extensions and deferments within 5 years made by the bank during the preceding period. This amount, however, is limited to the sum of $50,000,000.

Section 4 of title I regulates the interest which may be charged through national farm-loan associations and requires that it be reduced to not to exceed 4½ percent per annum, and the sum of $15,000,000 is authorized to be appropriated to be used by the Secretary of the Treasury to make payments to Federal land banks for interest payments accruing during subsequent fiscal years.

Section 5 regulates the amount that may be loaned to any one borrower and increases the amount from $25,000 to $50,000. Instead of increasing this amount it should have been decreased, so as to make sure that the larger farmers would not get too large a share of the benefits to the exclusion of the small farmers. The benefits of the bill should be extended to and spread over the small farmers. The larger farmers can secure credit through other agencies. The chairman of the committee explained this was to care for a few joint-stock land bank borrowers so that they may be refinanced.

Section 6 authorizes the making of direct loans where no local loan associations have been formed or are not functioning. I have been making a fight for legislation of this character for a number of years. However, I am not in sympathy with the requirement found in the paragraph which requires the borrowers to covenant to join local loan associations. The committee has proposed an amendment to make this optional. If not adopted it would discourage many farmers from making applications for loans, especially if they are compelled to guarantee the loans of each other. Why not require farmers of every community to guarantee their other indebtedness? Why not compel banks in certain groups or States to join and guarantee their deposits? The same principle will apply. Many farmers will be found who do not care to belong to associations which are required to guarantee loans to the less thrifty and improvident. This provision should be amended as recommended by the committee so as not to compel the farmers to join such associations unless they voluntarily agree to do so. This provision as originally drawn will add nothing to the bill, and it has caused thousands of farmers in the past not to take advantage of the provisions of the Rural Credit Act of July 17, 1916. I was a member of the committee that reported the rural credit bill in 1916 and urged that this provision be eliminated then. It would greatly popularize the law now to exclude the requirement by the adoption of the committee amendment making it optional.

Section 7 authorizes receivers appointed by the Federal Farm Loan Board to borrow money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the payment of taxes on farm lands owned by the bank and to issue receiver's certificates against the assets as security.

TITLE II

Title II proposes legislation for the benefit of the joint-stock land banks.

Section 201 has reference to limitations against the issuance of bonds or making new loans by joint-stock land banks after the enactment of this legislation and anticipates their liquidation.

Section 202 authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make available to the Farm Loan Commissioner for the use of joint-stock land banks $100,000,000 to be used for a period of not to exceed 2 years from the date of the approval of the act, charging said banks an interest rate of 4 percent per annum, and the joint-stock land banks are entitled to borrow not to exceed 60 percent of the normal value of farm real estate held.

The joint-stock land banks are required to reduce the interest rate to not to exceed 5 percent per annum, and to agree not to foreclose farm mortgages held, for a period of 2 years. Of course, these banks will be glad to do this, as they would prefer to receive 5 percent interest rather than no interest at all, and should farms be taken over under foreclosure, the procedure will be tedious and expensive, and the farms in the meantime will be held by agents or tenants and managed at a loss.

TITLE III

Title III makes provision for loans to farmers through the Farm Loan Commissioner for the following purposes only: (1) Refinancing, either in connection with proceedings under the recently amended Bankruptcy Act relating to agricultural compositions and extensions, or otherwise, any indebtedness, secured or unsecured, of the farmer; (2) providing working capital for his farm operations; and (3) enabling any farmer to redeem and/or repurchase farm property owned by him as a home prior to foreclosure, which has been foreclosed within 2 years prior to the enactment of this act or which is foreclosed after the enactment of this act.

Section 301 makes available to the Farm Loan Commissioner $300,000,000 to make loans to farmers for these purposes, secured by first and second mortgages.

This amount of $300,000,000, I fear, is totally inadequate. The interest on $2,000,000,000 of bonds under the control of the Federal land banks is to be guaranteed by the Government. The Federal land banks and the joint-stock land banks hold jointly about 19 percent of the farm indebtedness. It is true that the Federal land banks may make additional loans; but for the most part, let me warn the farmers of the country that I very much fear that this legislation guaranteeing the interest on bonds will be used to strengthen the Federal land banks which hold mortgages aggregating $1,146,000,000.

The last Congress appropriated $125,000,000 in aid of the Federal land banks, and the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, in a speech, stated that after careful examination no new loans had been made. Recently the unexpended balance was reappropriated or authorized to be used in aid of these banks. What I want to make sure of is that the farmers may be able to secure loans to enable them to repossess themselves of or to retain their homes. We should be sure that this legislation, when enacted, does accomplish this purpose and is sympathetically administered to carry out the intent of Congress.

The table which I have inserted above shows that commercial banks hold farm mortgages aggregating $1,020,000,000, mortgage companies $988,000,000, insurance companies $2,164,000,000, retired farmers $1,006,000,000, active farmers $339,000,000, other individuals $1,453,000,000, and other agencies $685,000,000.

In other words, 81 percent of farm mortgages are held by other individuals, corporations, and agencies, and not by the Federal land banks or the joint-stock land banks. This section, 301, which only makes $300,000,000 available, is wholly inadequate and the amount should be greatly increased. It authorizes loans to be secured by first and second mortgages on farm lands which shall not exceed 75 percent of the normal value thereof after this value is ascertained upon appraisal made under the terms of the Federal Farm Loan Act.

I doubt the wisdom of permitting the taking of second mortgages. First-mortgage loans should be increased and made upon the normal value of the land, but if the Government permits the taking of a second mortgage the Farm Loan Commissioner ultimately, in order to protect the Government, will be forced to buy in the first mortgages. Thousands of holders of second mortgages have come to grief within the past 5 years and the Government should be protected against loss as well as the individual. Extend liberal credit of the Government on long terms at low rates of interest to the farmers, then legislate to restore to them the foreign markets so as to insure them the cost of production plus a reasonable profit, and finally expand the currency so as to increase the exchange value of their farm products.

Section 301 also provides that no loan in excess of $5,000 shall be made to any one farmer. This provision is inconsistent with section 5 under title I, which authorizes loans to be made by the Federal land banks up to the amount of $50,000. I favor the lower loans as I have already indicated.

This same section, 301, requires that an agreement be entered into to repay the indebtedness in installments, and that (1) the interest rate shall not exceed 5 percent, and (2) that the repayment of the loan shall be on the amortization plan so as to extinguish the loan within a period of 10 years.

Let us examine this provision a little more closely. This would require an amortization repayment of 10 percent on the loan annually, in addition to the interest of 5 percent per annum, which would require the farmer to make too large a repayment each year in addition to taxes and upkeep and other farm and family living expenses. Of course, no farmer can make such a large annual payment at the present prices of farm products. He cannot do it even at peak prices. The interest rate on the loans should be lower and the time for paying the principal should be extended over a period of at least 35 years when a payment of about 1 percent annually on the principal would extinguish the principal of the loan.

TITLE IV

Title IV authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans in an amount not exceeding $5,000,000 to drainage districts, levee districts, irrigation districts, and similar districts organized under the laws of any State, and to political subdivisions of States, which have undertaken projects devoted chiefly to the improvement of land for agricultural purposes to enable such districts or political subdivisions to refinance their outstanding indebtedness.

This is an important provision, and will be of great aid to drainage districts throughout the country. I invite your attention to the fact that loans under this section may be made for a period not exceeding 40 years and contrast it with the requirement as to loans made to individuals under title III, to be repaid upon the amortization plan within 10 years.

The general purposes of the bill are sympathetic to the farmers; but, as I have pointed out, the larger benefits, as shown in titles I and II, are in the interest of the Federal farm land banks, which are authorized to issue $2,000,000,000 in bonds, the interest upon which is guaranteed by the Government, and joint-stock land banks, which is aided in the sum of $100,000,000. Let us extend proportionate relief to all classes who are the holders of mortgages, so as to be quite sure that all farmer mortgagees will be benefited.

Title III, which makes direct loans to farmers, is restricted to the sum of $300,000,000. This amount should be substantially increased and the provision for a second mortgage eliminated.

I have been making every effort possible to secure the consideration of legislation to refinance farm loans, and have introduced a bill (H.R. 3209) to create 12 Federal rural mortgage land banks, with a capital stock of from $25,000,000 to $40,000,000 each, to be subscribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with money to be furnished by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, as in the case of the home loan banks. These Federal rural mortgage land banks would be authorized to issue bonds in the sum of 20 times the amount of their capital stock, as was the case when the Farm Loan Act was passed on July 17, 1916, said bonds, both principal and interest, to be guaranteed by the Government, and said banks are directed to make loans to all classes of farmers up to 60 percent of the normal value of their lands and 20 percent of the insured permanent improvements. A rate of interest of 3 percent per annum is provided to be paid, repayable on the amortization plan, extending over a period of not to exceed 40 years.

Provision is made in the bill for the reduction of both principal and interest under the supervision of an adjustment committee where distressed mortgagees are refinanced. This bill would not discriminate in favor of or against the Federal land banks or the joint-stock land banks, but would apply to all mortgage holders, individuals, corporations, insurance companies, Federal land banks, joint-stock land banks, commercial banks, and all other agencies alike.

The amount of bonds authorized to be issued, in the aggregate, by the Federal rural mortgage land banks would be adequate to take care of all distressed mortgages.

In addition to borrowing money for the repayment of existing mortgages, principal, and interest, and other necessary farm expenses, the bill would also permit money to be borrowed by farmers to pay taxes on their farm lands.

The bill is more comprehensive in its terms than the bill now under consideration by the House. However, the situation is so distressing and desperate that I am giving my earnest support to the pending bill on the theory that it is better to assist in securing the benefits it gives to the farmers rather than to destroy the farmers by the enactment of no legislation.

I have insisted that any bill which provides for the refinancing of farm mortgages should contain—

First. The amount of money, from whatever source secured, should be adequate to care for all distressed mortgages, regardless of whether they are held by individuals, corporations, insurance companies, farm-land banks, or other agencies;

Second. The rate of interest should be low to enable the farmers to take new courage in meeting their mortgage indebtedness; and Third. That such long-time mortgages should be extended to them, payable upon the amortization plan, so that it would not require more than 1 percent per annum.

Other legislation should be enacted for the benefit of the farmers, some of which is under consideration, which will insure the farmers a better price for farm products, bringing them at least the cost of production plus a reasonable profit; the tariff should be lowered and reciprocal agreements made so as to restore our foreign markets for farm products; and there should be such an expansion of the currency as will restore the exchange value of farm products. However, these measures are for separate legislation and perhaps cannot be embodied in this bill. I trust that the entire program will be studied and enacted into law before the adjournment of this extra session of Congress.

I voted to refer this bill to the Committee on Agriculture, first, because I felt that it dealt with matters of exclusive interest to the farmers; second, I believed that the Committee on Agriculture would be more sympathetic in the consideration of the bill than has been shown by the Banking and Currency Committee during the last Congress; and, third, that it had a more intimate knowledge of the present distressed condition of the farmers.

I feel sure that a further study of the farm question after this legislation is enacted will lead to additional legislation in the further interest of the farmers of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SNYDER].

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, the Nation is prosperous only when the farmers of the Nation are prosperous. All the children of all the people are happy and contented only when the agricultural interests are prosperous. Our educational and religious institutions cannot function if the buying power of all the people is reduced below certain fundamental levels. The only real wealth of a nation comes from the soil, and whenever the purchasing power of the tillers of the soil is lowered below a certain point, we destroy the equilibrium of prosperity. The price of wheat today, for instance, has reached the lowest level since the days of Queen Elizabeth, 300 years ago. We might make similar comparisons as to corn and cotton and other staple products.

But suffice it to say that not only the Members of Congress but every citizen in the United States realizes that there must be something done—and done quickly—to stabilize our institutions and give relief to the farmer, the laborer, and the little-business man.

I am proud to say that I am a dirt farmer from among the hills of Somerset, and know about the hardships of the farmers and the combination of complex problems they are up against today.

It falls to my lot to come from a district in Pennsylvania where one of my counties is the home of coke and coal. A county where the discriminating freight rates set up by the Interstate Commerce Commission a few years ago shut down our mines and closed our factory doors. Today we find 52 percent of all the population of that county—198,000—lining up in the bread line every Friday morning and getting their provisions for the coming week. It is a sad reflection on our institutions when such conditions exist in our very midst.

Are we, my fellow colleagues, willing to admit that institutions have sprung up within our own borders that we are no longer able to control? Are we willing to stand idly by and see millions of bushels of wheat in our granaries unused, and yet millions of men, women, and children asking for bread? Are we willing to stand by and see hundreds of thousands of tons of leather stored in our factories and warehouses and at the same time see an innumerable army of children toddling down our streets without shoes? Are we going to close our mental eyes to the fact that 10,000 times 10,000 bales of cotton and thousands of sheets of wool are resting in our great storehouses, waiting for a market, and at the same time multitudes—yes; millions of children and grown folks, if you please—shivering in the cold?

It was Macaulay, I believe, that said, "Your Constitution is all sail and no anchor—when a society has entered on its downward process either civilization or liberty must perish. Either some Caesar or Napoleon will seize the reins of government with a strong hand or your Republic will be as fearfully plundered and laid waste by barbarians in the twentieth century as the Roman Empire was in the fifth, with this difference, that the Huns and Vandals who ravaged the Roman Empire came from without and that your Huns and Vandals will have been engendered within your own country by your own institutions."

My colleagues, there is not one of us ready to admit that institutions have sprung up within our borders to such gigantic proportions that they can no longer be controlled. We admit that our social and economic fabric is out of joint and not functioning, but we, the Seventy-third Congress, believe that our house can be put in order and that measures can be enacted by this body that within a decade will put every farmer, every laborer, and every little-business man back to work under conditions more favorable than since the days of the Civil War.

The bill before us, my friends (H.R. 4795) embodies in it so many fundamentals that must be in our economic procedure, if the rehabilitation of our country is to be brought about, that it behooves us to forget the few discrepancies in the bill and support it for the common good of humanity.

Many of my friends from the South and the Middle West look upon Pennsylvania as a manufacturing State, a mining State, a State where they make iron and steel for a living. I am sure that you will bear with me for a few minutes while I give you a few statistics relative to farm products in Pennsylvania. I believe that after I give you these statistics the Agriculture Committee will realize that Pennsylvania deserves attention when agriculture measures are being considered.

I hear someone ask me where Pennsylvania stands in the production of some of the staple farm products. Here is where we stand or rather where we stood. Our standing has made such a dangerous drop the last 3 years that I am to support this measure with whatever amendments the committee may offer. In 1931 and 1932 Pennsylvania produced, as follows:

	1931	1932
Hay.....tons..	3,154,000	2,005,115
Tobacco.....pounds..	57,659,218	43,362,817
Potatoes.....bushels..	26,669,214	21,450,585
Wheat.....do....	20,162,814	13,465,385
Corn.....do....	62,147,814	47,516,218
Oats.....do....	28,143,294	24,136,284

In other words, my fellow colleagues, the State that gave us the Declaration of Independence and the Liberty Bell ranks sixth in the production of hay, fifth in the production of tobacco, seventeenth in the production of potatoes, sixteenth in the production of wheat, and fifteenth in the production of oats.

Further evidence that there is something wrong with the machinery that governs our farm products is realized when we observe what has happened in the last 3 years in Pennsylvania to our cattle, sheep, and hog industry.

In 1931 Pennsylvania produced $97,315,000 worth of cattle, hogs, and sheep.

In 1932 Pennsylvania produced only $74,218,516 worth of cattle, hogs, and sheep.

In 1933 the estimate is way down to $52,116,427 worth of cattle, hogs, and sheep.

These and other facts convince us that something must be done to protect the farmer, the laborer, and the little business man. And I believe, ladies and gentlemen, this bill, when it is enacted into a law and given a chance to work out over a space of 5 or 10 years, will give us thousands and thousands of independent home owners as well as tens of thousands of prosperous farmers, laborers, and little business men. [Applause.]

Here is a telegram I received today, which tells of the conditions in one of the counties in my district:

UNIONTOWN, PA., April 12, 1933.

Hon. J. BUELL SNYDER,
House of Representatives:

Fayette County, Pa., has 22,000 families receiving flour relief; more than 15,000 families, approximately 65,000 people, receiving full grocery relief; unemployment condition bad; 25 out of 34 Fayette County banks closed; coal mines flat; very little work on highways; Reconstruction Finance Corporation money and Pennsylvania State funds have given adequate local relief with thanks to our Governments at Washington and Harrisburg; absolutely necessary that additional large amounts of money be appropriated for needy until work resumes.

FAYETTE COUNTY EMERGENCY BOARD,
EARL S. AREFORD.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARY].

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, I am in complete accord with the splendid program of relief legislation that has been sent to this Congress by the President of the United States. I have supported all of this legislation, believing in each and every instance that it would bring about some relief in this hour of distress. I think the legislation we have passed has met with the approval of the people, and a most wonderful response has been given to it by the people as a whole. We can see direct benefits resulting from the legislation that has been enacted into law during this short period of the special session of this Congress. I have all faith in the legislation that has been submitted to us and I believe the greatest service this Congress can do for the American people is to enact the President's program into law as speedily as possible. Our President has proven himself to be a great leader and has restored in the hearts of the American people that confidence in their Government which they had almost lost in the several years past.

The bill which we have before us today is for the purpose of providing emergency relief with respect to agricultural indebtedness by refinancing the mortgage debts of the American farmer. To my mind it is the most important measure that has come or will come before this Congress and goes farther toward giving relief to millions of American farmers who have borne the brunt of this horrible depression from its inception up to the present time. The importance of the question we are called upon today to consider cannot be overestimated nor the gravity of the situation be overstated. Long before the crash of the stock market and the collapse of business had spread their withering blight over this country the American farmer was being ruined because the price of his farm commodities was too low to permit him to carry the excessive rates of interest upon his indebtedness and discharge the ever-mounting tax bills that were piling up on him. He has been ground to death between the two stones of excessive interest rates and high taxes.

Although his pitiable condition has been known to everybody for years, and his failure has been disclosed in thousands of instances of mortgages being foreclosed and homes being sold from under their owners, up to this time very little has been offered in the way of legislation that would really relieve the farmer. This bill, I firmly believe, will bring to him a measure of the relief to which he has been entitled for many years. Farm mortgages have always borne an excessive rate of interest. Because of their very nature, they should have borne the lowest possible rate of interest in comparison with that of other business or industries. Strange to say, they have borne the highest rate of interest, and this fact has contributed largely to the complete collapse of agriculture and the destruction of homes from one end of our land to the other. There are many of us in this Congress who have contended for the past 2 years that the place to start the cure of our troubles is in the soil. We have believed, and still believe, that there can be no permanent prosperity in the commercial world until farming is put upon a stable and prosperous basis. Agriculture is the bedrock of our civilization, and until we can make the producers of farm commodities prosperous, we can never restore the purchasing power of the people of this Nation and bring about a complete business recovery.

For nearly 2 years Congress, attempting to fight this depression and put business back upon its feet, has worked at the wrong end of the problem. By legislative enactment, more than $2,000,000,000 have been spent through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to aid the big interests, such as banks, railroads, insurance companies, and so forth. Notwithstanding the heavy drain made upon the Treasury in an attempt to bolster up the big business interests, we have seen our banking system completely collapse, every bank in America close, and insurance companies and railroad companies everywhere in the hands of receivers. Any attempt made by the followers of the principle that agriculture should receive aid from the Government has been met with opposition by those interested in big business who have put forth the propaganda that legislation attempting to refinance the farmer and place his heavy burden of debt where it could be carried would be class legislation. However, this idea of class legislation was not mentioned when the big bankers, the railroads, and the insurance companies called on the Treasury of the United States for financial aid at a low rate of interest, claiming it to be necessary to carry on the business of the country.

As a matter of fact, such legislation was merely refinancing the financier, and the great agricultural classes, which were most entitled to help, have been neglected until they have reached a stage of almost complete collapse. Now, big business and all others are realizing that something must be done to save the American farmer and his home, and every thinking person understands that the foundation of this Nation is agriculture, and on that foundation we must rebuild and rehabilitate the industrial and commercial world.

Mr. Chairman, this bill should become a law. The farm-mortgage indebtedness of this country should be refinanced at a lower rate of interest, and in many instances the debt itself should be scaled down, as can be done under the provisions of this bill. Personally I am of the opinion that the maximum rate of interest should be changed from 4½ to 3 percent, and I hope that this change will be made before this bill is finally enacted into law. I fully realize the necessity of putting this legislation through the House as quickly as possible under a rule which will not permit its passage to be long drawn out by subjecting it to amendments. If this bill is properly administered, with the aid of those who are in sympathy with it and the cause it represents, I think the farm indebtedness can and will be refinanced upon a 3 percent basis, which will bring a very great relief to the distressed farmer and enable him to carry on, protect, and perpetuate that greatest of all American institutions, the American home.

This bill will bring real relief to the distressed farmer who, by reason of conditions over which he has no control, is unable to meet the payments upon his mortgage debt. By the plan of refinancing as herein set out he will have his interest very materially reduced and all payments upon principal will be suspended for a period of 5 years; that is, during a period of 5 years he will have to pay only the interest upon his loan, and at a much reduced rate. This will stop foreclosures and save many farmers from losing their homes. In the 5-year period that the principal payments are suspended he will have an opportunity to get back on his feet. I firmly believe this measure, if enacted into law, will save American agriculture. It will instill new hope and courage in the American farmer and give him an opportunity to work out his own troubles and finally rehabilitate that great basic industry, which is absolutely essential to our national life.

This plan, of course, is going to cost the Federal Government some money; just how much no one can say, but I believe it will be small in comparison with the benefits that will be derived from it. Whatever the cost may be, we cannot fail to extend this relief and save our farmers from complete disaster which is now facing them. We have already spent much more out of the Federal Treasury to help banks, railroads, insurance companies, and other big business than this refinancing of farm mortgages would cost. Why not spend some to help the farmer? His land is the best security on earth, and the money invested in financing him will eventually be returned. Much of the other that has been furnished to the big-business interests will never be returned.

Mr. Chairman, it is inconceivable to me that Congress would fail to enact this sort of legislation. The idea has been advanced that it might cost the Government too much money and that we cannot afford to assume so great a responsibility. A few years ago, when the world was engulfed in the greatest war of all history, the American people did not hesitate to go to the relief of all mankind, to take a part in the fight to save humanity from imperialism, and to turn into a glorious victory what then seemed to be inevitable defeat for the Allies. We entered that conflict with but one determination in view, that of winning the war, regardless of what the cost might be to the Treasury of our Nation. No one then would have dared to suggest that the cost was too great and that the Government could not afford to make through Congress the huge appropriations that were necessary to carry on that war to a successful conclusion. Our appropriations to win that war were approximately $27,000,000,000. In addition to that, we lent approximately $12,000,000,000 to the Allies, who were then prostrate and in dire distress. So magnanimous were we at that time that the interest rates on those loans were fixed at an average of about 2 percent. For the past 4 years we have been engaged in a warfare far greater in importance to our people than the World War ever was. We have been and are still waging a great war against an economic depression that has brought misery and woe to almost the entire population of America. No class of our people has suffered so much and so long in this depression as the American farmer. Can we now say that the expense of a few million dollars, if necessary, should not be incurred by the Government in order to save the farmers of America from ultimate bankruptcy and ruin?

Mr. Chairman, I know if we measure things by present values that the farm mortgages will in many instances exceed the value of the land. But there is no normal value now because there is no sale for land. I firmly believe that refinancing of mortgages at the low rate of interest set out in this bill will in itself be such a boon to the agricultural industry that the values of farm land will immediately begin to rise and that the Government will in the end lose nothing under this bill. It is an inconsistent thing in my mind to say that farm mortgages should not be refinanced on an interest rate around 3 percent when untold millions have been furnished by the Government to the shipping industries at interest rates below 2 percent. Aid and protection in the form of subsidies, low interest rates, and tariff benefits have been given by the Government to all classes of industry except farming. I am heartily in favor, not only of the refinancing of the heavy indebtedness of the farmer but of the refinancing of the small home owner which is proposed in a companion bill to the one we now have under consideration.

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, may I call your attention to the fact that this Government collects in taxes on one farm product, namely tobacco, which is grown in only a few States, more revenue per year than the cost per year of the entire interest charges upon the farm mortgages in the United States would be under this bill. For that reason alone, this Congress cannot fail to give this much-needed relief provided in the bill now before us. With the material reduction of overhead expense resulting from the passage of this bill and the benefits that we hope the farmer will receive from the legislation recently passed for the purpose of raising commodity prices, the time should not be far distant when the American farmer will be on the road to complete recovery. Then the purchasing power of our people will be restored, which will insure the return of prosperity. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MARSHALL].

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, it is quite evident that, with the adoption of the rule which was adopted here yesterday, we are going to either pass this measure or none, dealing with the question of the refinancing of farm mortgages. I do not want to be an obstructionist; and as a member of the Committee on Agriculture, which has had the bill under consideration, I want very briefly to give one or two reasons why I think I am justified, as are other Members of Congress, in supporting the bill. One of those reasons appears in the first title. I am of the opinion that it will go a little way toward stabilizing the purchases of real estate. In other words, the interest rate is such that there will be some new capital put into real-estate purchases. Men will buy farms at the rate of interest provided here if they have a place where they can get the money. Today there is no such place. Another thing that is of interest to me, and which I think will benefit the farmer, is that in my county and in your county and all other counties in the United States there are creditors and debtors who can sit down around a table and agree on a reduction of the value of their mortgages, but that necessitates some source of getting hold of cash to enable them to bring about the consummation of their agreement. Under the provisions of this bill there is a source of revenue which they can tap and get the money to put into effect the terms of their compromise agreement. I feel that will grant considerable relief to many hard-pressed debtors in this country. There is another feature of the bill, and it seems to be the one which is troubling Members here quite a little, and I wish I had time to talk about it.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLANNAGAN] raised the question in regard to the joint-stock land banks. I do not hold any brief for the joint-stock land banks, but that very question that Mr. FLANNAGAN brought up was discussed fully in our committee. Most of the committee would be only too glad if the provision that he refers to could be written into the bill, but it seems that it could not be. Others took the position that we should strike the entire section out of the bill. I think the reason that was not done was because the members of the committee felt that without some relief to the joint-stock land banks, about 47 of them today, which is all of them, would be put in a position where they would be in danger of receiverships within the very near future. I think the members of the committee felt they did not want to assume the responsibility of refusing to grant some relief that would prevent such a situation as that occurring. Receiverships of these banks undoubtedly would bring about further depression in the value of every foot of real estate in the country, because of the immense amount of foreclosures that would be brought about.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS. Does this bill contemplate any action that would absorb the joint-stock land banks, so that after the efficacy of this bill shall have been expended they will operate then more under the cloak of the Government than now?

Mr. MARSHALL. This bill provides for orderly liquidation of the joint-stock land banks, and they will gradually pass out of the picture under the provisions of this act. Section 203 of this bill also grants relief to the farmers. In other words, there is a lot of relief granted in this measure. It is not, in my opinion, going to bring about any millennium. I think, after all, that the ultimate relief to any farmer is in the opportunity on his part to sell his product at a price whereby he can live and pay his debts. The farmer is willing to pay his taxes and his interest. What he wants today is a demand for his product. If this bill and the other bills that are being submitted by the administration bring about an increase in farm prices, then the legislation will be worth-while, and if at the end of the period which this measure is supposed to carry us over, through which the farmer is provided a breathing spell, the situation has not been benefited, then I do not know of any prophet who can tell what is going to be the result in this country. I for one am endorsing this legislation with the hope and also with the belief that some real benefit will accrue to agriculture in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SWANK].

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, the amendment I have just submitted to the Committee on Agriculture, under the rule, provides that the Treasury Department shall issue Treasury notes or currency in the sum of $2,000,000,000, instead of issuing bonds in that amount, bearing a rate of interest at 4 percent per annum. The issuing of nontaxable, interest-bearing bonds by the Government of the United States should be stopped, and this is a good place and time to serve notice on the international bankers and kindred interests that they shall be permitted no longer to gather the cream of the land while so many of our people are suffering from lack of things to eat and wear. The great fortunes of the United States have been made almost wholly by the enactment of special legislation such as nontaxable, interest-bearing bonds, tariff legislation, and other forms of relief for those who are not in need.

The total public debt of the United States, as shown by the reports from the Treasury Department January 31, 1933, amounts to the sum of $20,601,992,731.90. Nearly all of this enormous sum is in bonds. The United States pays interest each year on these bonds and other forms of Government indebtedness in the sum of $600,000,000. I claim that this interest is a gift to those who eat but do not produce. Treasury notes can be issued without interest to circulate as Federal Reserve notes, national-bank notes, or other currency, without paying interest to any person.

Instead of the $2,000,000,000 bond issue at 4 percent per annum, as provided in the first section of this bill, my amendment would provide that the Treasury Department issue $2,000,000,000 in Treasury notes or currency to circulate as other money. The annual interest on $2,000,000,000 at 4 percent is $80,000,000. If Treasury notes were issued, as provided in my amendment, and Congress should appropriate $80,000,000 per year and place this sum in a sinking fund, it would retire these notes in 25 years, or if $40,000,000 were appropriated each year they would be retired in 50 years. At the same rate, they would be retired, of course, in less time than this because they would be retired part at a time. Twenty-five-year bonds at 4 percent would cause the Government to pay $2,000,000,000 in interest in a period of 25 years, and the principal would still stand unpaid. The issuance of nontaxable bonds by the United States Government is unfair to our people. The Budget cannot be balanced by such legislation.

This bill is not just as I would have it, and probably does not conform to the ideas of each individual member of the Committee on Agriculture. I know this committee gave the bill fair consideration and deep study, but all legislation is somewhat of a compromise. I have always supported agricultural legislation, because I know that agriculture is the basis of all business and there can be no prosperity until it returns to the farm. The report of the Committee on Agriculture accompanying this bill shows that in 1933 farm mortgages of the United States amounted to $8,500,000,000, and personal or short-term farm indebtedness amounted to $3,500,000,000. This makes a total farm indebtedness of $12,000,000,000, and there must be relief enacted to relieve these conditions. While this bill is not as I would write it, yet I believe it will render relief to our agricultural interests. Mortgage foreclosures on the farms of our country are increasing all the time. Something must be done. I hope legislation will be enacted to provide for a scaling down of these mortgages. A mortgage for $1,000 made when wheat was $1 per bushel and cotton 20 cents per pound is the same now as a $4,000 mortgage with wheat at 25 cents per bushel and cotton at 5 cents per pound.

In my opinion, if this Congress would remonetize silver, provide for the issuance of certificates against silver bullion, place silver on a parity with gold, and then reduce the content of the gold dollar, this would scale down the indebtedness and raise commodity prices so the farmers could pay out of debt. On the 29th day of March 1933 I introduced a bill providing for an emergency relief program and a method of financing the same. That bill provides that the Treasury Department shall issue Treasury notes or currency in the sum of $500,000,000 instead of nontaxable interest-bearing bonds. The interest on $500,000,000 at 4 percent would amount to $20,000,000 per year. The bill provides that Congress shall appropriate this amount each year, place it in a sinking fund, and it will enable the whole currency issue to be paid off in 25 years. By retiring this indebtedness at intervals the time would be less than 25 years. One of the greatest relief measures that could be enacted into law by this Congress would be to put a stop to the issuance of nontaxable interest-bearing bonds. I wanted to submit this amendment for the consideration of the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

DIRECT CREDITS FOR THE FARMER

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, there is one feature of this bill that I am very much interested in, and that is the feature that relates to direct credits to the farmers. Never before have I had the opportunity to vote for this principle, contained in a bill in the House of Representatives. I believe that the issuance of currency and the handling of a large part of the credit is purely a governmental function, and should not be farmed out to private bankers. In title III of this bill the farmer is granted privileges that will really help every farmer, not just the 42 percent who have their homes encumbered by farm mortgages, but it will help the tenant farmers and the other farmers who have their homes paid for. It will help all the farmers. The farmer who is suffering most today is the farmer who owes several hundred dollars on his farm equipment, his livestock, and other property that he has to carry on his farming with, in addition to his farm mortgage. In addition to that, he owes unsecured debts. Under title III of this bill the Government agent steps in and says to that farmer, "You get your creditors to scale their debts down to where the debts will represent three quarters of the value of the property, and the Government will pay off the ceditors with Government money and you will have 10 years to pay the Government back, and during the next 3 years you will not have to pay one penny on the principal, but just pay the Government on the interest for the next 3 years."

FARMERS REFINANCED FOR CURRENT YEAR

In addition to that, the Government steps in and refinances the farmer for the current crop year. He needs money to make this year's crop, and the Government gives him a loan which is sufficient to enable him to make this crop. I consider that a great benefit extended to the farmers, for the reason that in the South, and I know in many sections of the West, the farmers are paying from 10 to 40 percent interest. They go to the banks in the early spring and make arrangements for small loans. The banker does not give the farmer the money he has borrowed all at one time, but he gives him so much each month, and almost by the time the banker has paid to the farmer the last installment the farmer has commenced repaying the loan. So when you figure it out you will discover that the banker is being paid from 10 to 40 percent interest on those farm loans. This bill reduces the farmer's interest rate to not to exceed 5 percent. If a creditor has security on the farmer's livestock and his farm machinery and he does not want to transfer it to the Government, the Government agent will say to him, "All right; you reduce your debt to three quarters of the value of this property", or if it does not represent more than three quarters of the value of the property, then the Government will take a second lien on that property and a first lien on the remainder of the other property that the farmer has, if any, and advance him the money to make a crop with this year. Title III of this bill makes a longer step in the right direction than any bill I have ever had the pleasure of voting for in the House of Representatives.

CREDIT OF GOVERNMENT SHOULD BE USED FOR GENERAL WELFARE

I believe the time is coming in this country, and this is one step in that direction, when the Government will use its credit for the benefit of the general welfare of the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] has expired.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Texas 2 additional minutes.

POWERFUL BANKERS USE GOVERNMENT CREDIT FREE

Mr. PATMAN. The Federal Reserve Act was passed. It was nothing more than a law that permitted the bankers to use Government credit. These private banks, the Federal Reserve banks, have never paid the Government one penny for the use of that credit as provided in section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act. Section 16 of that act says that when Federal Reserve notes, which represent a mortgage on all the homes and all the property of all the people in the Nation, are delivered to the Federal Reserve banks, the Federal Reserve banks shall pay to the Government agent the rate of interest that is assessed by the Federal Reserve Board, and until this good day not one penny of interest has been paid by the private banking institutions for the use of billions and billions and billions of dollars of credit every year.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Has the gentleman determined the amount that the Government of the United States would have due to it if the bankers had paid the amount they should have paid to the Government, and is it not a fact that if that had been paid, we would not have been compelled to penalize the veterans?

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman is correct and I thank him for his contribution. If that law had been complied with as written—and it is still the law, not one word of it has been repealed—we would not have an unbalanced Budget. Neither would we have a deficit in the Treasury of the United States today. Many people will starve in this country because the powerful private bankers have been given special favors and used the credit of the Nation free of charge.

I hope the time will come in this country when the credit of this Nation will be used for the benefit of the producers and the wage earners as well as the big banks. Title II is a long step in that direction. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHRISTIANSON].

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, recently there was conducted by the University of Minnesota a survey of farm income in the southeastern part of the State, the most prosperous section in Minnesota, a section which was affected little, if at all, by the land speculation of 14 years ago, a section where the dairy cow has long been a symbol of contented prosperity. The survey showed that 143 farmers, a fair cross section of southeastern Minnesota, in 1932 earned no labor income. On the contrary, they lacked, on the average, $768 of earning 5 percent interest on the fair value of their investment.

There is probably no part of this country better fitted for successful agriculture than this region; still the farmers tilling its soil, after giving their labor and that of their families without compensaton, lacked $5 an acre of making ends meet.

It should be evident from the results of this survey that loaning them money at 4½ percent interest will fall far short of saving the farmers of America. In Minnesota the farm-loan rate has been from 5 to 5½ percent during the very period when agriculture has sunk from the comparative affluence of 1919 to the desperate, hopeless poverty of 1933.

If, with an interest rate of 5 percent, we sank deeper and deeper into debt during the last 13 years, during much of which time the prices of farm products were three times what they are now, let me ask you upon what you base your hope that a one half percent reduction in the interest rate will accomplish our economic recovery?

Most of the present farm debt was created at a time when the products of agriculture brought from three to five times what they bring today. In 1920 it required 200 bushels of wheat to pay the interest on a $10,000 farm mortgage. Today it requires 1,200 bushels. A 5-percent note executed in 1926 draws 15 percent interest today on the basis of the amount of produce required to pay it, and if the note was executed in 1920 it draws 25 percent. There is no industry in the world that can have the burden of its debts increased fivefold in 13 years and survive.

I am aware that it will be argued that the solution of the problem lies in better prices. I realize that higher prices are needed, and I hope that the measure we passed the other day will bring them. Let me remind you, however, that prices might be doubled, and they still would be a third lower than they were in 1926 and less than half of what they were in 1920. Any reasonably anticipated increase in the price level must be accompanied by a substantial reduction in the interest burden if the relief given shall be sufficient to save agriculture from universal bankruptcy.

Let me add that it is extremely doubtful whether the price reaction in any event will come soon enough to head off disaster, unless the burden of the present indebtedness be radically reduced. There are crop surpluses on hand which will, for some considerable time, offset any reduction in acreage. Price adjustment will at best be slow. It would be almost convincing proof that miracles still happen if, in the face of the depressing influences against which the new devices will have to contend, price adjustment could be accomplished in time to head off catastrophe.

Interest rates must be reduced. They must be based upon present, or reasonably prospective, earning power; not upon what we may dream or imagine earning power will be some years hence. Prices have been deflated, and interest rates must be deflated accordingly, if we would reestablish the solvency of the Nation. Logically, the only alternative is inflation, and let me add parenthetically that I am for a reasonable amount of it.

The next question is, granted that the interest rate should be reduced, at what point it should be fixed. From the facts to which I have referred, the conclusion would be unescapable that, on the basis of his present capacity to pay, the farmer should be charged one third of the rate he paid in 1926, which would be about 1⅔ percent. If he paid 3 percent the farmer would be generous—he would be showing the same kind of generosity he exhibited during the long decades when, Lazarus-like, he was content to pick the crumbs which fell from the table where Dives dined on the rich viands of special privilege.

You ask, "Where will the money come from to refinance farm loans at so low a rate of interest?" I am aware of the fact that the last offering of Federal securities brought 4 and 4¼ percent. At first I was inclined to agree with those who saw in this the first sure sign of Democratic ineptitude, but I was forced to change my mind when I learned that the last issue under the late Republican administration was sold at a discount of 4.26. Then I concluded that the Democratic administration in equaling a Republican performance had exhibited statesmanship of high order.

However, I am not one of those who believe that it is necessary for the United States Government to pay 4 percent interest on its borrowings. What the Government has to do during a period of great uncertainty, when the banking system of the country is in utter collapse, when every bank is closed, and when confidence in the financial stability of the Government itself is shaken, is no criterion of what it should do under conditions more nearly normal. Not long ago, short-term offerings were over-subscribed at three fourths of 1 percent. Long-term securities will carry a higher rate, but there is every reason to believe that securities backed by the Government will command a premium.

From now on, with every industry overbuilt, every business overexpanded, every corporation overcapitalized, the investing public will experience increasing difficulty in finding places for prudent and safe investment. More and more the people will entrust their surplus capital to the Government. Two percent interest has attracted hundreds of millions of dollars into the postal savings banks. It is a mistake to write 4 percent into this legislation. It is an invitation to establish a rate which under present conditions is not only excessive but usurious. Leave "4 percent" in this bill, and we will pay 4 percent. It would be better to place no limitation than to place one that is too high.

But we have a club with which to hold interest rates on Government borrowings down. Why do not we use it? The power to issue currency is that club.

You say that there must be adequate gold reserves to back the currency? We have a wide margin of safety. You say that currency must be kept instantly redeemable. Go to the Treasury with a $100 bill today, and see how much gold you get. You say we must stay on the gold standard? The essence of the gold standard is redemption. If that is true, then today we have the gold standard in reverse.

If the Government has some of your gold, and you hold the equivalent of a warehouse receipt to prove it, you cannot get your gold. If you have some of your own gold in possession, the Government not only demands that you surrender it, but enforces its demand with the penalty of imprisonment. I am no longer going to get excited when somebody warns me that doing thus and so will put us off the gold standard. Many things have happened lately to strengthen economic heretics in their heresies.

To say that we are on a gold basis is to juggle with words. We recently authorized the issuance of currency against commercial paper held by distressed banks. If the promissory notes of shaky business men, held by shaky banks, is good security against which to issue currency, then the objection to the issuance of currency against bonds secured by mortgages on the Nation's only permanent and imperishable wealth—land—loses its point.

So, by the logic of events, I have been forced from my ancient moorings. There was a time when I considered certain features of the Frazier bill absurdly unsound. But when I saw the Nation's faith and credit used to support tottering banks, embarrassed life-insurance companies, and railroads hopelessly in red, I changed my mind. If the most respectable economists and the most conservative business men could give their high approval to such a venture, then I concluded it was not economic heresy to expect and to ask a like solicitude for that industry upon the well-being of which depends the solvency of banks, insurance companies, and railroads.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that the majority found it necessary to adopt a rule against amendments. As a Member new to this body but somewhat experienced in legislative procedure elsewhere, I find it difficult to understand how a similar rule, enforced by another party at certain times in the past, justifies the present restriction. Certainly two wrongs do not make a right.

So lacking the opportunity to support amendments, I hope I shall have a chance to vote for a motion to recommit, to the end that there may be full consideration of facts and arguments which I feel the committee must have overlooked. [Applause.]

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHRISTIANSON], in conjunction with others, complains that there is no opportunity to offer amendments. I am satisfied that if the gentleman from Minnesota or any other gentleman has any real, constructive amendments to offer to the bill and will submit them to the splendid Committee on Agriculture, which has devoted so much time to this legislation, the committee will give them favorable consideration.

I myself am one of these who believe that the House should have an opportunity at all times to consider legislation under the so-called "liberal 5-minute rule." But I have tried for many years to obtain legislation that would relieve the farming situation in this country and have voted for every farm bill that was brought before the House; yet the condition of the farmer has not grown better; in fact, has grown much worse. Now, here is a bill that offers real and immediate relief to the farmers. That it is not perfect no one will deny; but I leave you draw your own conclusions as to the kind of bill we would have if every Member were to have his particular amendment adopted and made a part of this bill.

In my estimation, the administration and the committee, which have considered this proposed legislation for many weeks, are in a better position than any individual Member or group of Members of this House to say to the House and to the country, "Here is the most feasible bill that can be passed"; and I, for one, believe we should have confidence in their judgment.

I know the President has devoted not only weeks but months to this proposition. He desires to be of real and immediate aid to the farmers, and in this way to the country. For this reason I question the wisdom of bringing in at this critical time a bill that is open to amendment, feeling that the herculean efforts of the administration and the committee to bring about speedy and practical relief would be abrogated by this provision.

I myself could suggest a dozen amendments to this bill that, in my own humble judgment, might improve it; but I am not going to set myself above the committee and the President and his advisers and say that my judgment is superior to theirs.

Therefore, although I am as desirous as anyone to offer amendments, I will, in deference to the judgment of the President and his advisers and of the Committee on Agriculture, withhold my views.

I have stated on this floor many times that if we could eliminate the speculation and gambling that is taking place on our exchanges, which is destructive to fair prices of farm commodities, the farmer would be aided and prices would be improved and increased. I believe that not until the purchasing power is restored to the farmers of this country can we expect the return of prosperity, and therefore I am willing to follow the President and the committee in any constructive legislation.

But this is merely a beginning. There will be other bills forthcoming, and we will have the opportunity in the near future to legislate for the farmers and for the wage earners and residents of the large centers who have suffered more perhaps than the farmers of the United States. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROWE].

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the farm is the backbone of our country. Without it, nothing else would be of value. Life is sustained by the farmer.

The farmer is the worst handicapped of any class. Price fixing of machinery, fertilizer, and so forth, and maintained at near-peak prices, which the farmer must pay, has ruined him. He takes his crop to market, and high handling costs leaves him little, sometimes nothing, and he must take what he is offered.

The trouble on the farm started in 1920, and not in 1929. His panic began 9 long years before the real panic. To pacify him, he was given a palliative—a farm mortgage—then a crop and seed loan. What he needed was a market, lower tax, an equal distribution of tax, lower interest; in other words, a fair, equitable deal.

Farm mortgages were made covering debts made when things were at highest-peak prices. The rates of interest were peak rates. Today the farmer receives less than half for what he sells than he received then, but his interest rate remains unchanged.

If agriculture is to be restored, one most important thing is a reduction of the interest rate commensurate with the price he receives for his products; and with the Federal Government lending aid, the rates can and should be greatly reduced.

A 3-percent rate of interest would be more in keeping with his returns today; 3-percent nontaxable bonds, gilt-edge securities replacing frozen loans—loans on which neither principal nor interest is being paid—would be a great step toward prosperity to the mortgaged farmer.

MONEY NOT TOUCHED

Almost everything and everybody has received the ax generously since this panic started—all labor, storekeepers, property owners, and so forth. It is difficult to find anyone anywhere who is not reduced—many to poverty and complete loss of a life's savings. Even millions have lost all. Yet the money lenders of the big centers, the big bankers, are still getting, as Shylock did, their pound of flesh.

Our Government loans to shipping interests and others, I am informed, from one half of 1 percent up to 2 percent per annum. Why, then, should not our Government step in and give relief to our agriculturalists and compel a lowering of interest rates to a parity of prices received by them for their farm products.

Protection and subsidies are given to manufacturers, shipping interests, airplane interests, but the farmer has been caught between the two millstones.

The choice today is:

First. Reduce drastically the interest rate on all farm mortgages for a short period (5 years is necessary); or Second. The liquidation of a few million farmers, who will lose their farms and be thrown on the towns and cities to join our present unemployed army of millions.

Here is an opportunity to aid millions at nominal cost to the Government by comparison.

I shall support this as a part of the great relief program of the President, which I believe to be worthy of the support of every Member of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER].

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in my remarks a farm bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman and friends of this Congress, we are confronted here with very serious issues. For years and years this Congress or the United States Government has issued to private industry money at an exceptionally low rate of interest. I am asking today that the farmer be granted the same opportunity to borrow money at the same rate of interest that is paid by the Shipping Board, by the railroad corporations, and various other private interests.

To illustrate: The National Grain Corporation, which is nothing more than a political set-up, not long ago borrowed $15,500,000 from the Government at an interest rate of one eighth of 1 percent. I have been told that they turned right around and with that money bought United States Government bonds paying 4½ percent. They are paying salaries of fifteen to twenty-five thousand dollars out of that profit they are making from the Government.

With regard to this farm-mortgage proposition, in the State of Minnesota in 1923, we passed a rural credits bureau act, establishing a rural credit bureau to loan State money to farmers at 5¼ percent interest. That is 10 years ago, when farm prices were still fair. Money was loaned on 13,434 farms. Since that time 6,129 of those farms have become delinquent and 3,190 have been foreclosed, leaving less than 30 percent or 4,115 of those farms in good standing, and that with an interest rate of 5¼ percent. I ask in all fairness, What will it do with three fourths of 1 percent reduction under this bill? If they could not pay and save their farms at 5¼ percent 10 years ago, how can they pay their interest at the rate of 4½ percent now under conditions that we are confronted with today?

The records of the Department of Agriculture show that the average owner-operated farm in 1930 had a mortgage of $3,550 against it, while the average tenant-operated farm had a mortgage of $7,780. If we take the average owner-operated farm, and we cut the interest rate 2 percent on a $3,000 mortgage, it would constitute a saving of approximately $60 a year, and does this Congress feel that with $60 a year we are going to pull the average farmer out of the hole? Sixty dollars a year is just an aggravation when it comes to real benefits for the farmer.

The State legislatures of 21 States have memorialized Congress to refinance the farm debt of the United States by issue of Federal Reserve notes—carrying no interest burden on taxpayers.

These 21 States carry a farm-mortgage debt, as ascertained by the United States Department of Agriculture, amounting to $6,689,000,000, or 70 percent of the total farm-mortgage debt of the United States.

These memorials of 21 States to Congress represent the sentiment of both branches of the respective State legislatures, signed by their governors, lieutenant governors, and speakers.

In our representative system of government are the views of the legislative bodies of States carrying 70 percent of the farm debt of the United States—officially transmitted and recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—worthy of consideration by a Congress engaged in framing a measure to refinance farm debt?

Among the State legislatures memorializing Congress to employ non-interest-bearing Federal Reserve notes to refinance the farm debt was the great State of Illinois, represented by the Speaker of this House.

Illinois, which carries $685,365,000 of farm-mortgage debt, the second largest of any State in the Union, was one of the first to memorialize Congress for the Federal Reserve note plan embodied in the Frazier bill. Illinois is presumed to be one of our safe and sound States—which is apparent in the fact that it gives us our venerated Speaker, the mainstay of the administration.

Shall we not listen to the great State of Illinois in legislative body duly assembled pursuant to the Illinois Constitution?

Among these 20 States were the Big Five which head the list in volume of farm-mortgage debt, which rank as follows:

Ranking State:
Iowa	$1,402,178,000
Illinois	685,365,000
Nebraska	599,418,000
Minnesota	558,458,000
Wisconsin	529,992,000

The Big Five alone carry nearly 40 percent of the total farm-mortgage debt of the United States—a larger aggregate farm debt than that of all the 28 States which failed to memorialize Congress for the Frazier bill.

Following the Big Five came seven Middle West and Western States carrying farm debts ranging from $200,000,000 to $500,000,000 each, in order of rank as follows:

California	$460,511,000
Kansas	447,586,000
South Dakota	370,946,000
Indiana	277,269,000
Michigan	235,399,000
North Dakota	230,250,000
Oklahoma	228,513,000

The combined 12 States thus far listed for the Federal Reserve note plan of farm-debt financing have an aggregate farm-mortgage debt of over $6,000,000,000, or 63 per cent of the United States total.

Still, there are eight more States of the West and South, all supporting the plan of Illinois, which gave the House its Speaker:

Colorado	$144,464,000
Montana	104,852,000
Tennessee	96,711,000
South Carolina	77,214,000
Oregon	110,875,000
Idaho	100,033,000
Arizona	29,006,000
Nevada	13,997,000

The total of 20 farm-mortgaged States from which Congress has received legislative memorials for the Federal-note plan bring to us an aggregate farm debt of $6,689,000,000, 70 percent of the national total, to back their legislative judgment.

FARM MORTGAGES BY CLASS OF MORTGAGEES

The total farm-mortgage debt of $9,463,526,000 is classified by the United States Department of Agriculture according to percentage of holdings by the principal lending agencies, as follows:

	Percent
Insurance companies	22.9
Federal land banks	12.1
Joint-stock land banks	7.0
Commercial banks	10.8
Mortgage loan companies	10.4

	Percent
Retired farmers	10.6
Active farmers	3.6
Other individuals	15.4
Other agencies	7.2

Insurance companies, the largest class of mortgagees, hold nearly one fourth of the total farm-mortgage debt of the United States.

Testimony before congressional banking committees, House and Senate, shows that some of the larger insurance companies have divided their mortgages into two main classes, "good loans" and "bad loans." Their financial agents are instructed to settle "good loans" on offers of 50 percent of the face value of the mortgage, and to refuse no cash offer of any kind for settlement of "bad loans."

This indicates that the mortgages held by such insurance companies have a present cash value of 50 percent or less. If they can get Uncle Sam to hold the bag for full face value of the mortgage, the mortgagee companies stand good to "soak" the American taxpayer for a billion or so.

Nearly half of the farm mortgage debt is borne by the farms of the West North Central States—Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri, and Kansas—which carry an aggregate of $4,056,187,000, being 43 percent of the country's total.

In these West North Central States insurance companies hold 32.3 percent, or nearly one third of all farm mortgages, and mortgage companies 15.1 percent, with other agencies 5.8 percent—an aggregate of 53.2 percent in the hands of mortgage agencies, against only 7 percent Federal land banks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 minutes more.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. In the five East North Central States—Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio—insurance companies hold 19.4 percent, "other individuals" 17.2 percent, commercial banks 14 percent, retired farmers 14.1 percent, Federal land banks 8.2 percent.

In the aggregate of the 12 States of the so-called "Middle West" the farm-mortgage debt approximates $6,000,000,000, or 63 percent of the United States total, in which the principal holders are insurance companies and other mortgage agencies. These are the States that have memorialized Congress to enact the Frazier plan of issuing Reserve notes for settlement of mortgages at the appraised present cash value—in lieu of the mortgage-agency plan of bond issues to leave Uncle Sam and the taxpayer holding the bag for the face value of the mortgage with a fine profit of margin for a pool of speculators.

Refinancing by Reserve note issues at present cash value of mortgage after fair appraisement by the Government has three points in favor of public welfare:

First. It involves no interest burden to be met by the taxpayer.

Second. It gives no subsidy or graft to the mortgagee—no "dole" to a speculative pool.

Third. It keeps down the public debt and helps Uncle Sam to balance his Budget.

That is the way it looks to the State legislatures of the 21 great Commonwealths that carry 70 percent of the farm-mortgage debt of the United States—including the State that gives the present Congress the greatest Speaker since Muhlenberg, the Speaker of the first American Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. ARENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 minutes more.

Mr. ARENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Yes.

Mr. ARENS. I have a telegram here which I have just received from the chairman of the Department of Rural Credits, which reads as follows:

Total mortgage loans made, 13,434; total delinquency, 6,129; total farms acquired, 3,190.

Out of 13,000 and odd farms that the State of Minnesota loaned money on, it will be seen that 6,129 are delinquent, and over 3,000 have been foreclosed. Four thousand and odd remain in good standing. The interest rate fixed when I was a member of the Senate of the State of Minnesota 10 years ago was 5¼ percent, plus 1 percent for amortization.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I shall support a motion to recommit this bill and send it back to the committee for reconsideration, and I trust that our Agricultural Committee will see fit to give this the consideration that I feel it is entitled to, so that we may issue against these farm mortgages a Federal bank currency which will do something toward bringing money into the country and helping and assisting the American farmer, and which will also have a tendency to raise the price of farm products. Until we do that they cannot pay the interest, even though it be 1 percent. [Applause.]

Under unanimous consent I append herewith H.R. 4799, which I introduced:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be the policy of the Government of the United States to issue to the producers of three basic and nonperishable farm products—wheat, cotton, and tobacco—under regulations and limitations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, certificates of purchase which bear no interest and which shall be a legal tender for all debts, public and private.

SEC. 2. For the purpose of effecting the intention of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall have power to license inspectors and graders and establish rules for their guidance and to determine what shall constitute approved storage upon the land of the producer or producers. It shall be the policy of the Government to pay no charges for storage in public warehouses.

SEC. 3. (a) For each 1,000 bushels of contract grade of wheat grown in the United States in the year 1933, inspected, stored, and insured in a manner approved by the Secretary of Agriculture and the title thereto delivered to him, the Secretary of Agriculture shall receive from the Secretary of the Treasury $1,000 in legal-tender certificates of such denominations as he, the Secretary of Agriculture, desires, and after deducting 3 percent as administration costs shall turn over to the seller, who provides suitable contract for the storage of the wheat free of charges on his premises until sold, the remaining 97 percent of the certificates so issued. The face value of certificates for other grades of wheat are to be regulated by prevailing custom, of which the Secretary of Agriculture shall be the sole judge.

(b) For each 1,000 pounds of cotton middling in grade and seven eighths inch in staple length grown in the United States in the year 1933, inspected, stored, and insured in a manner approved by the Secretary of Agriculture and the title thereto delivered to him, the Secretary of Agriculture shall receive from the Secretary of the Treasury $100 in legal-tender certificates in such denominations as he, the Secretary of Agriculture, desires, and after deducting 3 percent as administration costs he shall turn over to the seller, who provides suitable contract to store the cotton free of charge on his premises until sold, the remaining 97 percent of said certificates. The purchase value of other grades and staples of cotton shall be regulated by prevailing custom, of which the Secretary of Agriculture shall be the sole judge.

(c) Upon the application of the grower of tobacco the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause to be inspected and graded all kinds of tobaccos of which 100 tons or more are grown in the United States in 1933, and upon approval of inspection, storage, and insurance, and title thereto delivered to him, shall cause to be issued to him such values in legal-tender certificates by the Secretary of the Treasury as are consistent with a fair profit to the grower and financial prudence on the part of the Government; and the Secretary of Agriculture, after deducting estimated costs of administration, shall turn over to the seller, who provides suitable contract for the storage of the tobacco without charge on the premises until sold, the remaining part of the certificates. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to name the minimum amount of each grade of tobacco which shall be a basis of an issue of legal-tender certificates.

(d) The word "seller" as used in this act means any person, association of persons, partnership, or corporation engaged in the growth of tobacco, wheat, or cotton, the title to which is conveyed to the Secretary of Agriculture.

(e) In no case shall legal-tender certificates be paid by the Secretary of Agriculture to any person, association of persons, partnership, or corporation not the actual grower of the tobacco, wheat, or cotton for which the certificates are issued.

(f) It is the intent and purpose of this act that the Secretary of Agriculture shall purchase all wheat, cotton, and tobacco offered if grown in the year 1933 at the prices and under the conditions herein mentioned.

SEC. 4. Under such conditions as may be agreed upon by the Postmaster General and the Secretary of Agriculture, every mail carrier and postmaster throughout the United States shall be required without extra pay to handle samples of these three farm products and have them tested and appraisals made and see that proper storage is provided for on farms covered by their respective mail routes or in a territory served by such postmasters or carriers, to fill out the applications to the Secretary of Agriculture for legal-tender certificates, and report to the Secretary of Agriculture for the United States.

SEC. 5. Any wheat, cotton, or tobacco of the growth and crop of 1933 may be sold by the Secretary of Agriculture to any miller, trader, processor, or exporter in return for the amount of legal-tender certificates issued against a like amount and quality of the commodity in storage sold and an additional amount of other currency to cover costs of administration, transportation, or profit. For this and other purposes the Secretary of Agriculture shall set a basic transportation rate on all wheat, cotton, and tobacco, with the same milling in transit, concentration, storage, or other special service incident to transportation provision as exists at the time of the sale, so that the cost of transporting the same freight shall be the same amount regardless of the distance it is hauled within the United States.

(b) In no case shall the Secretary of Agriculture sell wheat, cotton, or tobacco for less than the amount of certificates issued against the same amount and quality of the commodity sold plus the cost of administration and equalized transportation. If any profit should accrue to the Government from the operation of this act, it shall be kept in a separate fund to be administered as Congress shall further declare. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized to lend to the Secretary of Agriculture such sums as may be reasonably necessary to the operation of this act.

(c) All legal-tender certificates received by the Secretary of Agriculture in payment for wheat, cotton, or tobacco shall be immediately retired by the Secretary of the Treasury.

(d) Any importer holding legal-tender certificates issued against wheat, cotton, or tobacco under the authority of this act, upon proper showing to the Secretary of the Treasury that currency of the United States backed by gold or silver is necessary for a transaction or transactions with aliens in a foreign state, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to receive such wheat, cotton, or tobacco certificates at par for currency of the United States.

SEC. 6. Any willful misrepresentation concerning or burning, stealing, or in any way willfully or with lack of ordinarily prudent care destroying value in wheat, cotton, or tobacco in the control of the Secretary of Agriculture under this act shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment of not more than 5 years, or both.

SEC. 7. The authority of the Secretary of Agriculture under this act shall not extend to the wheat, cotton, or tobacco crops of 1934, 1935, or 1936 without the express order of the President of the United States, which express order may limit but not enlarge authority under this act. No authority under this act shall extend to any crops not grown and stored as approved by the Secretary of Agriculture before January 1, 1937.

SEC. 8. Acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the terms of this act are hereby suspended during the operation of this act insofar as they are inconsistent.

SEC. 9. Should part of the provisions of this act be declared void, all others operable shall remain in full force.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and incorporate therein a resolution which I have introduced and several excerpts.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this bill introduced by our colleague, Mr. JONES, as chairman of the committee, was sent to us by the President of the United States. The President had it prepared by his experts. It is a part of his plans and policies in a program seeking economic recovery for the entire Nation. While the bill does not suit me, and while I would change many of its provisions, I am going to support it. I have made up my mind that during this crisis I am going to support every measure that the President sends us, and which he tells us that he needs, and which he says is a part of his plans and policies, save and except one subject, and only one, and that is intoxicating liquor, upon which I am definitely pledged to the people I have the honor to represent. I am not going with him on liquor but I am going along with him on every other subject.

As soon as the Seventy-second Congress met in December 1931, I then introduced a measure to stop foreclosures of farms during the depression and to provide for the redemption of farms already foreclosed. This bill, House Joint Resolution 79, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency on December 8, 1931. Other similar measures were sent to that committee. It held hearings and would have favorably reported the legislation if it had not been stopped by the Treasury Department.

The preamble of the measure I introduced recited the following:

Joint resolution authorizing and directing Federal land banks to suspend and withhold foreclosure of mortgages during the present depression, where farmers are unable to make payment of interest or principal due, and to provide for redemption of any such farm lands foreclosed since April 1, 1930

Whereas it was the intent and purpose of Congress when passing the Federal Farm Loan Act in July, 1916, to aid and protect farmers in times of distress and not to ruin and rob them of their farms; and

Whereas when creating Federal land banks Congress provided that if the initial $750,000 capital required for every Federal land bank was not subscribed within 30 days the Secretary of the Treasury should subscribe for it on behalf of the United States; that all salaries and expenses of the Federal Farm Loan Board supervising such banks be paid annually by the Government; that such banks be national depositaries; that the capital, reserve, surplus, and income of every Federal land bank be exempt from all taxes, Federal, State, municipal, and local; that the mortgages and bonds of said banks shall be deemed and held to be instrumentalities of the Government of the United States; that the bonds of said banks shall be a lawful investment for all fiduciary and trust funds, and may be accepted as security for all public deposits; and other subsidies were extended to said Federal land banks by the Government to enable them to grant special aid and protection to distressed farmers; and

Whereas certain portions of the agricultural sections of the United States have been inflicted with prolonged and continued droughts, and with unprecedented low prices for farm products, making it impossible for certain farmers who are borrowers from the Federal land banks to meet the interest and other maturities on their loans; and

Whereas the Federal land banks have harshly adopted the policy of granting no extensions regardless of circumstances, and illustrative of such policy, the Federal Land Bank of Houston, Tex., one of the 12 such banks authorized and created by Congress, in its booklet distributed in 1931 to its 56,767 farmers who had borrowed $151,600,000, entitled "Why the Federal Land Bank Can Grant No Extensions", cold-bloodedly announced:

"All borrowers should understand that it is a waste of time to ask for extensions. If one cannot pay, then he should sell his farm to one who can and will";

And asserting further in such booklet that the Federal land bank is not a Government institution; and

Whereas Congress alone can stop this wholesale foreclosure of farms, and without appropriate action these distressed farmers and their wives and little hungry children will be turned out into the cold and lose their homes: Therefore be it

Resolved—

And so forth. And, Mr. Chairman, in such measure I provided adequate machinery to stop all foreclosures of farms during this depression, where farmers were financially unable to pay, and to provide means of redeeming and recovering back the numerous farms which have been improvidently foreclosed since April 1, 1930.

I feel encouraged that my efforts have helped to bring this acute situation to the attention of the President, and I feel that my efforts have helped to influence him to send this remedial legislation before this Congress which we are now considering. I hope and pray that it may be sufficient to afford much-needed relief to the many distressed farmers of the United States.

This bill is in the nature of a fulfillment of a promise which our President made to the farmers when he was on the hustings seeking election. Naturally it does not suit all of the 435 Members of this House. It would be extremely hard to frame any bill that would suit all of us exactly. But because it does not suit some of us Democrats, is that any reason why we should deny to the President the right and opportunity to put his own plans into execution? If we stop any of his proposals, we will break the sequence of his plans and he will not have an opportunity to put his policies and program into effect. So I am going down the line with him, excepting the one subject of liquor, during this crisis.

When the time comes for us to reassert our constitutional powers after our country gets back to normalcy, then I am going to stop going along.

And in this Congress I am not going to support measures that do not appeal to me, when they are not specially requested by the President. There will be plenty of such measures for us to stop.

For instance, are your farmers at home interested now in spending $48,500 on a junket trip over to Rome, Italy, every year, spent in the name of farmers?

Mr. PIERCE. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Not a bit. No. It is ridiculous.

Mr. PIERCE. It is nonsense.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; it is nonsense. I hope that every new Member in this House will help stop that, because such a bill is soon to come before this House. The Committee on Foreign Affairs this morning favorably reported House Joint Resolution No. 149, the first part of which reads as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing an annual appropriation for the expenses of participation by the United States in the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, Italy

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $48,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually for the expenses of participation by the United States in the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, Italy, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

Note, if you please, that this is a $48,500 junket to Rome, Italy. Note, too, that it is to be an annual affair, and that after you pass this bill, there will be spent on such a junket $48,500 every year until Congress can pass another law to stop it. It could not be stopped without a law being passed to stop it. This has been going on for several years, and I have been making a fight each year to stop it. I succeed in knocking the appropriation out on a point of order, and then it is put back in the Senate. But when you pass this bill, it cannot be stopped on a point of order.

I want you to note another thing about this resolution. The main committeeman on this junket has been getting only $5,000 for his service each year. It is proposed to raise his salary to $7,500 plus his expenses. Note subdivision (2) of the resolution:

(2) Not to exceed $7,500 for the salary of a United States member of the permanent committee of the International Institute of Agriculture.

We have reduced and cut $1,500 off of our own pay, and have cut an additional 2 months' pay off of our own term, and have reduced our mileage 25 percent, and have reduced our stationery allowance for office expenses 25 percent, and have reduced our allowance for clerical hire $750 per year, which reduction many of us bear out of our own pocket rather than reduce our employees who have dependents to support, and yet when we will do all that to ourselves, we are asked by this resolution to increase the pay of this useless junketeer from $5,000 to $7,500, when the whole junket ought to be abolished.

Note subdivision (3) of this resolution providing for the maintenance of quarters at Rome, Italy:

(3) Not to exceed $5,500 for rent of living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light, as authorized by the act approved June 26, 1930 (46 Stat. 818); compensation of subordinate employees without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended; actual and necessary traveling expenses; and other contingent expenses incident to the maintenance of an office at Rome, Italy, for a United States member of the permanent committee of the International Institute of Agriculture.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment I shall be glad to yield. What farmer, or what Representative here specially looking after the interests of the farmers would expect a good farm measure to come from the Committee on Foreign Affairs? Incidentally, we want some home-affairs committee to handle the farmers' problems in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I knew I would get a rise out of my friend SOL BLOOM from New York, because this is one of his pets.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman, before he answers that, read the next paragraph, so as to show how this money is to be expended?

Mr. BLANTON. I have read all three paragraphs. None are good. I want to say to my friend Sol——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has expired.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas 2 additional minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] did the finest work in the world on the George Washington Bicentennial Commission, and he ought not now spoil it. He got more of good for the people of the United States out of the money he expended than they have ever gotten before. He ought not spoil it by any such foolishness as this wasteful resolution.

Now, I want to call attention to something else. There is now pending on the calendar under a privileged rule another companion resolution, known as the Sirovich resolution——

Mr. BLOOM. Oh, no; not a companion resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. It is companion in the sense that it is unnecessary and will provide another useless, expensive junket. I want to tell Sol this, that before this special session adjourns you Members had better watch out for many of these junket-trip resolutions. [Applause.] I want to see, when they call up that Sirovich resolution, which is a waste of public money, which provides that they can employ lawyers without limitation and pay them salaries without limitation, that they can employ experts without limitation, just how many Members will vote for it, for it is nothing on God's earth but a foolish waste of money; and when that comes up under that rule I hope that every one of you new Members will be here and will help us to defeat it. If you will help, we will kill it. We ought to stop every one of them that comes up in this Congress. We ought to get back to normalcy, and we ought to quit spending money foolishly in the name of the farmers and the American taxpayer when it does not help any farmer at all. [Applause.]

This Sirovich resolution (H.Res. 95) proposes to create a special committee of seven Members of the House; and proposes that it, or any subcommittee of it, may sit at any time it desires, and may sit anywhere in the United States, or Europe, or the whole world for that matter, that it may desire, wholly without any limitation. And the taxpayers of the United States will have to pay the bill. Section 3 provides:

SEC. 3. The committee is empowered to subpena persons, records, documents, swear witnesses, and to secure such data and any or all other information as may be deemed necessary to aid the committee in the ascertainment—

And so forth. And the taxpayers of the United States will have to pay all of the witness fees and traveling expenses and cost of attendance by such witnesses wholly without any limitation being placed thereon by Congress.

Section 4 provides:

SEC. 4. The committee is authorized and empowered to employ such legal counsel, technical or other counsel, auditors, clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to make such expenditures, including expenditures for actual travel and subsistence of members and employees, and for such other and further expenditure as are necessary for the efficient execution of its functions under this resolution, including transcription, printing, and binding of data and reports.

Note that this special committee may employ all of the lawyers that it wants. No limitation is placed on it as to the number of lawyers. Note that no limitation is placed on the committee as to the size of the legal fees it may agree to pay the lawyers. The committee may contract to pay any fee it desires to pay, and the people of the United States will have to foot the bill. No limitation is placed on the number of technical experts it may employ or the salaries it may pay them. No limitation is placed on the number of auditors, or stenographers, or clerks, or other assistants it may employ, or the salaries it may pay them. This resolution could cost the people a tremendous sum of money. No such resolution ought to be passed by this Congress. We ought to defeat it when it is called up.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I want the gentleman to know that while both he and I are interested in baseball and football, the Farmer-Labor delegation is here listening to him this afternoon.

Mr. BLANTON. I never think about who else is listening to me besides my colleagues present before me.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I want the gentleman to know we are on the job.

Mr. BLANTON. That is good. You have to keep on the watch, all of you. At the last part of a session is when these things come up, and they always look very innocent. You have to look down between the lines and check them up. They are brought in here with 30 minutes' debate, and you must be on the watch for them to be able to stop them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM].

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad I have the opportunity to answer my friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and explain to you about this resolution. My only thought in rising at this time is not to allow the Members who listened to the gentleman from Texas to get the wrong idea and imagine that this is going to be a junket. It is nothing of the kind. This resolution is recommended and endorsed by the President of the United States; it is approved by the Secretary of State; and it is approved by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BLANTON. But it is not one of the President's bills, even though someone may have gotten it endorsed by Franklin D. Roosevelt, and the President is the man we are following. We are not following this, that, or the other department, but the President. [Applause.]

Mr. BLOOM. That is the time for the applause to come in. There is no question about that, but let me tell the gentleman from Texas, I said that this was endorsed by the President of the United States, so that means Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield.

Mr. McGUGIN. Is it endorsed by the Postmaster General?

Mr. BLOOM. I do not think that question is in order at this time. If the gentleman wishes to find out I should be glad to speak for the Postmaster General, but I do not think it is necessary. However, let me say this——

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I am sorry, but I do not have the time. if the gentleman will get me more time I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM].

Mr. BLOOM. This is nothing new. This Agricultural Institute in Rome has been in existence for years. We belong to it. By treaty we are a part of it, and we have been a part of it for many years. The only thing is that there is an increase of $2,500 in this salary item about which you heard the gentleman from Texas read. It is necessary that we send a man to represent the United States who is able to understand agriculture and at the same time is a linguist. He must understand French, because all the proceedings are held in French. Formerly the United States had a representative who paid money out of his own pocket. He was a man of means. This resolution says that the salary of the representative shall not exceed $7,500.

Furthermore, out of this salary allowance the representative must pay the rent of living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light, as authorized by the act approved June 20, 1930, compensation for all subordinate employees without regard to classification, actual and necessary travel expense, and every contingent expense incident to the maintenance of an office at Rome, Italy, for a United States member of the permanent committee of the International Institute of Agriculture. Out of this money he must pay all the expenses of running this office. This is no junket and this is nothing new.

Mr. BLANTON. It is worth nothing to our farmers. I have been trying to stop it for years.

Mr. BLOOM. That is right. The gentleman from Texas has been trying to stop it for years, but he cannot stop it. The Government of the United States is paying now about $44,000 a year to maintain this thing without a representative. We are obligated by treaty to do this, and as long as we are spending this money it is necessary that we should have an efficient representative. You gentlemen who represent farming districts get the benefit of all these reports from every part of the world. We are only asking for an additional $2,500 if necessary; and the representative must pay all the expenses of running this office. So I think the gentleman from Texas would be one of the first to support this resolution if he only understood exactly what it calls for.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Is not one of the most important matters carried on by this institute a study of world markets?

Mr. BLOOM. Absolutely.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. And are not we farmers vitally interested in it?

Mr. BLOOM. You farmers are vitally interested in it. I am not a farmer. The farmers from Forty-second Street and Broadway do not need this. There is no amount of money this Government spends for any purpose pertaining to farming from which as much benefit is derived as from this.

The only reason we ask for this increase is because the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Agriculture asked us to put this $7,500 in so we could get a person to represent us at a salary and not ask him to go down in his pocket and pay his own expenses.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not believe that our real dirt farmers are any more interested than the farmers of Wall Street, Forty-second Street, or Broadway are interested in thus wasting $48,500 annually at Rome, Italy. Tell me one dollar of benefit this $48,500 institute at Rome, Italy, has ever been to the farmers of America.

Mr. BLOOM. I shall be pleased to do so at the proper time. When this resolution is brought out I shall bring in the full report which will convince my farm friends that the results have been beneficial.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. CHURCH].

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, I am supporting this bill because it is calculated to aid the farmers of this country. It does not seem to go quite as far as it might in that respect; however, it is an administration measure and I know it is good. I wish it could have been enacted into law the day after Roosevelt was inaugurated President of the United States.

Today the farmers are standing with outstretched hands calling to Washington for help. They are asking for relief from a condition that they had nothing to do with bringing on. Their troubles have come upon them while they were working, sweating, and doing the best they could. But pathetic as it is, in spite of their efforts, they have failed and are now losing their farms by hundreds of thousands each year. Farmers are generally brave men. They are too proud and independent to ask relief from their own mistakes. They are now asking relief from the crimes and blunders of others. The farmers of America have pitted their strength and courage against the adverse things of nature. Their muscles and brain they pit against the soil; against the cold and heat; against scale bugs, grasshoppers, rodents, and pests of every earthly kind. They realize that they have to fight everything on earth, under the earth, and above the earth. When they bravely roll up their sleeves, and go out on the farm to work, they assume the risk and take their chances against all of these things. But their Government they do not fear. They always stand with brown, broad hands, ready to protect it whenever it is necessary, and with childlike faith they believe their Government will, under all circumstances, protect them.

They likewise have faith in the people of America. They feed and clothe them—why should they not protect the farmer? I think they have a right to think and reason as they do, for the farmer is doing the lion's share for the people of this country. Without the farmers, the rest of the people could not get along. They would simply starve to death; they are the benefactors of all the rest of the people. The great Commoner, Bryan, said:

> Burn down your cities and leave your farms, and others will spring up as if by magic; but destroy your farms and the grass will grow in the streets of every city of this Nation.

Yet it is a fact that while the farmers have toiled and sweat on their farms the very people whom they have fed and clothed have taken advantage of them; their farms and all the products of the farms have depreciated in value more than half. This, of course, has completely ruined the farmers financially. They find now that their farms will no longer provide them the necessities of life, much less supply the other people of America with food and clothing. Let us inquire why the farmers find themselves in bankruptcy as they do today.

It is simply because the dollar, the measuring stick of all commodities, has doubled in value in the last 3 years. Why has the dollar thus increased in value? Because dollars have become scarce. Why have dollars become scarce? Because those who own most of the dollars have called them home, shut them up in their vaults, and thus removed them from circulation. Why has money become more valuable? Because it has been made scarce. If you make any commodity, including money, scarce, you will make it valuable just in proportion as it is made scarce. Take away one half of the beef cattle of this country and you will double the price of meat, take away one half of the available coal of this country and you will double the price of coal, and take from circulation one half of the available money in this country and you will double the purchasing power of what remains. One half of the money is no longer available, therefore it is twice as valuable compared to other things; and for this reason, and this reason alone, the farmers' land, cattle, sheep, stock, his wheat, corn, cotton, chickens, and products of all kinds have depreciated in value. The question is, What is the Congress of the United States going to do about it? The value of the dollar must come down to the value it had when the bulk of the debts of this country were incurred. As long as the value of money is twice as high as it was when the debts were contracted the debts can never be paid. As long as the value of money is twice as high as it was when the mortgages were given the mortgages can never be paid. As long as the two hundred billion debts of this country have to be paid with $400,000,000,000 worth of effort they can never be paid.

The only way we will ever get out of our present depression is by expanding the currency, stabilizing the dollar, and fixing its price in comparison with what ought to be the price of commodities and labor. As it is, there is nothing more dishonest than a dollar. By its instability, it upsets the value of everything else on earth. We have fixed the weight of the dollar, and I can see no reason why we should not stabilize its value. Should we do this, I am sure that those who have artificially contracted the currency will start a cry that can be heard around the world. If we begin the reasonable expansion of the currency those who have contracted it, and now hold most of the money of this country in the hollow of their hands, will begin to loosen their grip by beginning again to make investments, and conditions will change for the better almost over night. The reason the moneyed powers of the country are so willing to talk against expansion is because when currency is expanded, their dollars decrease in purchasing power. If a person had placed in the ground $5,000,000 three years ago, and left it there, his $5,000,000 would be worth in purchasing power nearly fifteen million now. In other words, he could buy three times as much with the same amount of money as he could have done 3 years ago. No wonder people with vast fortunes are in favor of contracting instead of expanding the currency. Expansion is the great enemy of the extremely rich, but it is the only friend of the hundred million debtors and laborers in the United States in times such as we have now.

Another thing I want to call your attention to is that if we expect to restore the confidence of people in our banks, a law should be passed as soon as possible guaranteeing bank deposits, so that the person who puts money into a bank will have positive assurance that he will be able to take it out when he desires. Ten thousand banks have failed in the United States in the last 10 years and thereby about $1,800,000,000 have been lost to the depositors. Under such conditions, is it any wonder that people have so little confidence in banks that they are afraid to intrust their lifelong savings to the uncertainties of such institutions? It is little less than a disgrace to the Congress that it has not provided this necessary legislation many years ago.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. ZIONCHECK] such time as he may desire.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, I have a high personal regard for the members of the Committee on Agriculture. I feel satisfied they brought in the best bill that the regular rules and precedents on House committees would allow them to bring in, but I shall vote to recommit the bill to the Agricultural Committee with instructions to bring in an irregular bill—Frazier bill—which will afford real substantial relief to the farmers. If the bill is not recommitted, I shall vote for it, because it is better than no bill whatsoever.

The reason many of us Members voted to have this measure sent to the Agricultural Committee rather than the Banking and Currency Committee was our hope that the Agricultural Committee would not report a bill which would meet with the approval of the so-called "financial interests" of the country, and only today did we learn that the Agricultural Committee has no jurisdiction whatsoever on matters concerning the issuance of currency, particularly Treasury notes or Federal Reserve bank notes. But inasmuch as the House broke all precedents in sending this measure to the Agricultural Committee, I feel certain that if this measure is recommitted and the Agricultural Committee reports the Frazier bill that the House will sustain this irregular action; and we all know that the House is the final authority in such matters.

I was one of the few Democrats who voted against the gag resolution yesterday, which precluded any and every amendment to this bill or even an amendment to an amendment submitted by the Committee on Agriculture itself. I was sorry to learn that the Democratic opposition to the Republican gag rules was nothing more than a hypocritical pretense of opposing the rule, for I had heretofore labored under the illusion that the Democratic Party fundamentally believed in constitutional government and abhorred the gagging process used by our Republican friends when in power.

This bill appears to me to be a relief bill for the bankers, the farm-loan banks, and the bondholders of the joint-stock land banks, together with other mortgagees which comprise the creditor class; for in my judgment for every dollar of relief that is given to the farmer these other interests receive $10 in relief. I challenge any reasonable-minded person to deny that this bill is not primarily directed toward the relief of the financial interests of this country and not the farmers, for it specifically provides for refinancing mortgages only to the extent of 50 percent of the present valuation of the land, plus a 20 percent valuation of the permanent insured improvements thereon. My information is that the majority of the present mortgages upon farms far exceeds such valuation for the reason that the loans were made in more prosperous years when the valuation was much greater than it is now in 1933.

I object to the provision in the bill which provides for the issuance and circulation of additional tax-exempt bonds bearing interest at the rate of 4 percent, which interest is guaranteed by the Federal Government. This provision does not create more currency by way of inflation, which is one of the dire needs of the farmer today, for that is the only legitimate way in which commodity prices to the farmer will be increased. This is not only desirable but an absolute necessity as a stimulant to restore economic stability. The present provision is deflationary. But, worst of all, the farmer will be required to pay a tribute to the financial interests of this country in the sum of $100,000,000 each year in interest on the bonds issued, and the bankers who get this interest will merely take these Government bonds and redeposit them with the United States Treasury or the Federal Reserve banks and receive currency, which they in turn will again loan at high rates of interest. This to me seems idiotic and almost suicidal.

Another reason why I do not favor the provisions of this bill is that the 4½ percent per annum interest to be charged to the farmer for refinancing of his loan is exorbitant under the present economic conditions. It is my opinion that the farmer, if charged any interest whatsoever, should not be forced to pay more than 1½ percent, together with a very long period in which to retire the principal indebtedness.

There is a further iniquity in this bill, and that is that the farmer is obliged to buy stock in the farm loan association equal to 5 percent of the loan. This amount is to be deducted from the loan the farmer makes and thus he would only receive 95 percent of the amount upon which he will be forced to pay interest.

There are many other objections to this bill which I will not take time to enumerate, inasmuch as they have been carefully covered in previous speeches by my able colleagues, and at this time I want to state that there is one phase of this bill which is a real step in the right direction, and that is the recognition of the principle of direct loan from the Government to the farmer without the intermediate tribute-exacting parasitic banker. Although only a small sum of money is provided for this purpose, nevertheless it may be termed a "toe hold" and is truly commendable.

To vote against this measure because it does not embody all the features which I would like, or which the farmer would like, would be to vote for no relief whatsoever at the present time, and, in my humble opinion, the urgency and need of the farmer are so great I will vote for this measure, even though it helps but a small percentage of the farmers of these great United States, and only hope that in the near future we will honestly tackle the problem which confronts us and pass a bill which will create real buying power in the backbone of our Nation, namely, the farmer, and bring real prosperity back to this land of plenty.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN] such time as he may desire.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 4795, now under consideration, which provides for—

Emergency relief with respect to agricultural indebtedness, to refinance farm mortgages at lower rates of interest, to amend and supplement the Federal Farm Loan Act, to provide for the orderly liquidation of joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes.

Frankly, I believe that this is the most important bill and the most necessary one that the Congress could now enact. It is probably the best piece of legislation which President Roosevelt has transmitted to the Congress.

Another measure which is of the highest importance and which I trust will be enacted by the Congress is one which will protect deposits in all banks in the United States. The American citizens have recently been commanded to bring out their savings and place them in banks—refusal to do so subjects them to severe penalty or punishment. My colleagues, if we are going to compel the American citizens to put their money in banks, it is only fair and just that we give them assurance that the Federal Treasury is behind their deposits and that they are safe and secure and are, in fact, guaranteed. No American citizen has ever doubted the security of deposits in post offices; then why not give the same security to bank deposits in the future as has been given to postal deposits in the past? At present such a measure would do more to reestablish confidence and hope in the minds of the American people than any other legislation which the Congress possibly could enact. [Applause.]

The bill now before us has for its purposes:

To enable the Federal land bank system to secure new capital and thereby to resume its functioning as an effective agricultural credit agency.

To reduce the burden of mortgage debt now oppressing the farmer and to lift the threat of imminent foreclosure.

To provide for liquidating in an orderly fashion the affairs of the joint-stock land banks.

To refinance the short-term indebtedness of the farmer, to provide him with working capital when necessary, and to help him redeem or repurchase his foreclosed farm home.

If there are doubts in the minds of my colleagues as to the imperativeness of these remedies as provided in the bill, then I would remind you of the tragic state in which agriculture now finds itself.

The amount of farm-mortgage indebtedness outstanding in 1933 is estimated at about $8,500,000,000.

The personal or short-term farm indebtedness is estimated at $3,500,000.

Approximately 42 percent of the farms of the United States are covered by mortgage.

The Federal land banks, as of November 30, 1932, held farm mortgages amounting to $1,121,000,000. The joint-stock land banks, as of the same date, held farm mortgages amounting to $415,000,000. Together the Federal land banks and the joint-stock land banks held 19 percent of the volume of outstanding farm mortgages, 23 percent was held by insurance companies, 11 percent by commercial banks, 10 percent by mortgage companies, 7 percent by other firms or agencies, and 30 percent by individuals.

In March 1932 farm-land values stood at 89 percent of 1912–14 value.

Gross farm income amounted in 1919 to $17,000,000,000; in 1923 to 1929 between $11,000,000,000 and $12,000,000,000; in 1930 to $9,347,000,000; in 1931, $6,920,000,000; in 1932, $5,000,000,000.

Forced sales numbered for the year ending March 1, 1931, 26.1 per thousand farms; for the year ending March 1, 1932, 41.7 per thousand farms.

These figures, it appears, are most authentic, and, frankly, they are astounding. No other industry except that of farming could have survived such burdens and reverses. No class of workers except farmers would have endured with such patience these adversities and hardships; but the farmers have ever been the backbone of our Nation, and they have instinctively borne up with courage under the heavy load, but even patience may cease to be a virtue; therefore, it is imperative that we promptly enact this bill and probably other measures which will relieve the situation. The farm bill recently passed by our body and now in the other legislative branch will, we believe, bring beneficial results; but the passage of the bill before us is very essential, because hundreds of thousands of farmers are now having their homes sold from under them through the foreclosure of mortgages. These mortgages were made, most of them, when money was easy to obtain and when the dollar purchased in some cases only one fourth or one third as much as it purchases today. It is impossible in many cases to pay these mortgages now, when money has such a large purchasing power and when it is almost unobtainable. Our farmers must have extension of time upon these mortgages. They must have the principal reduced and the rate of interest reduced. These are provisions of the bill before us.

The bill authorizes the Federal land banks to issue not exceeding $2,000,000,000 of farm-loan bonds at a rate of interest of not more than 4 percent, which shall be guaranteed, as to interest, by the United States. These bonds can be used in exchange for purchase of outstanding farm mortgages on terms best possible; also to make new loans on farm mortgages; also to refinance mortgages at lower interest. Thousands of holders of farm mortgages will discontinue them and trade them in for these bonds, the farmer receiving the benefit of the discount and also the lower rate of interest as borne in the bond. In turn, the party or parties disposing of such mortgages will be able to realize cash for these bonds if they should desire and this cash can be put back into circulation.

The bill also authorizes Federal land banks for 5 years to grant extensions to farm borrowers who, after investigation, are shown to be deserving. It also reduces, for a period of 5 years, the interest rate on all outstanding and new mortgages held by the Federal land banks to 4½ percent per annum and suspends the payment of the principal during the 5-year period. This moratorium on Federal land bank mortgages is sorely needed. It also authorizes the Federal land banks to make direct loans to farmers in localities where the national farm loan associations have not been organized, or where such associations are not now able to accept loan applications.

It prohibits joint-stock land banks from issuing tax-exempt bonds. It also authorizes and directs the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make $300,000,000 available to the Farm Loan Commissioner to be used in making direct loans to farmers upon first or second mortgages, and it provides that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may lend not more than $50,000,000 to refinance the indebtedness of drainage, levee, irrigation, and similar districts. This provision would enable loans to Florida drainage districts, and would be of great benefit not only to Florida but States with similar districts. Districts in my State probably have $16,000,000 indebtedness. It is true that some provisions of the bill are experimental, but with farmers in their present destitute plight I am willing to try almost anything with the hope for relief, because, frankly, they cannot survive much longer unless their debt burdens are lightened and the sale price of their produce raised. I trust my colleagues will vote for passage of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT].

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, what observations I have to make upon this bill I intend shall be blunt and to the point. I have tried to give the bill as careful, as thoughtful, and as sympathetic study as I could. I do not know what the real hopes of its sponsors may be, but I am convinced it will not do what they claim for it. It will not give to the depressed farmers of the country what they are entitled to and what, with one accord, they have demanded of this Congress in the way of Federal refinancing of their farm indebtedness.

I am quite aware, as has been so often suggested here, that this bill is better than nothing. But that, in my opinion, is the worst and most vulnerable argument that has been made for it. Of course it is better than nothing. But is that any reason why it should not be as good as it ought to be? Must we continually accept poor and ill-considered legislation just because it is a part of the President's program and is better than nothing? That is the principal argument that has been made for practically every bill which has been sent to us from the White House, and in most cases that was the only argument that could conscientiously be made for them.

Now, I am perfectly aware, Mr. Chairman, that debate upon this bill is futile. I realize that the gag rule under which it was brought in here effectively prevents us from amending it even in the slightest degree. We cannot, under the rule, propose any change or any improvement for it. We cannot substitute any other bill for it. We must take it or leave it just as it is.

I am also aware that under this gag rule all of us will vote for the bill in the end. And that, in my judgment, is the most objectionable feature of the majority leaders' manipulation of this bill. The rank and file of the Democrats as well as the Republicans know that this is entirely inadequate to meet the situation. The majority on both sides of the House would like to see a better bill substituted for it. But they know they cannot do that under the gag rule. They know that in the end they must accept the beggar's crumbs that are handed out to the farmer in this bill because the majority leaders will not permit them to vote upon any other bill upon the same subject at this session.

I say also that this procedure is just as objectionable to the rank and file of the majority as the rank and file of the minority. But the majority cannot help themselves. They owe their duty to the administration first and to the farmers afterward. I know, however, that some of them are straining under the bit their leaders have put into their mouths, because I have talked to them. I know they would like to revolt upon this particular bill if they dared. And some of them are going to dare.

And this, Mr. Chairman, leads me to express the hope, even if it is a bare hope, that at the close of this debate, when the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] makes his motion to recommit, that motion, with the help of the more daring among the Democrats, may prevail. In that case we will be in position to do something for the farmer in spite of the administration's leaders in the House. For then the committee will at least have an opportunity to consider what 6,000,000 farm families of this country have said they wanted and what the people of 21 States, by joint resolution of their legislatures now filed in Congress, have said they wanted, and that is the inclusion of the Fraizer bill for the refinancing of farm mortgages as a part of any general farm-relief program which is to be enacted at this session.

The State of Oregon, a district of which I have the honor as well as the responsibility of representing here, by formal action of its legislature in extraordinary session assembled last month, memorialized Congress to pass the Frazier bill. The enactment of this measure was also a part of the platform upon which I based my own candidacy for election to Congress. I feel, therefore, a double responsibility to the people I represent to do whatever may be within my limited power, under these very difficult circumstances, to help them secure this legislation now.

And the fact, Mr. Chairman, that the fight we are making here for an opportunity to substitute the provisions of the Frazier bill for the pending bill will in all probability be a hopeless fight, makes no difference. We may be small in effective numbers. Under the gag rule we may have little chance to prevail. But we at least have the satisfaction of knowing that we represent the wishes and the desires of more people than have ever united in a demand for any legislation of a national scope. [Applause.]

It is admitted that gentlemen who control the majority here have the power to thwart the demands of the farmers—to deny them the legislation they expect this Congress to give them. And we expect they will exercise that power, just as they have already exercised it under similar circumstances upon every bill that has been considered here. They can prevent consideration of the Frazier bill upon the motion to recommit by the simple expedient of ruling that it is not germane. But I say to them, if they do that, they are deliberately setting up the judgment and desires of one sole man in the White House and his little group of bankers and college professors who drew this bill against not only the considered judgment and desires of 30,000,000 farmers, whom the bill most affects, but against the solemn declarations of the people expressed through the legislatures of nearly one half of the sovereign States of this Union.

Never has the demand for any legislation been so universal, so well considered, and so intelligent as the demand that Congress pass the Frazier bill now. Never before have the great leaders who have devoted their lives to the task of evolving a rational remedy for the ills which beset the farmer, and consequently the Nation, been so in accord upon the solution which, they all agree, lies embodied in the Frazier bill. And never before have the people of this country shown sufficient interest in any legislation to cause their legislatures in 21 States to demand of Congress its enactment.

The Frazier bill is no temporizing measure. It is no halfway solution, as this bill is. It is a complete, comprehensive, and permanent plan for lifting the agricultural population of this country out of bankruptcy through the refinancing of farm mortgages by the Federal Government upon the best security that can be given to any nation, the land of the nation itself. And it undertakes to do this at a rate of interest which the farmer can pay, namely, 1½ percent per year and 1½ percent upon the principal. If you say that rate of interest is too low, we tell you that no farmer can pay a higher rate and meet his taxes and his costs of operation. That is the conclusion of every farm economist who has made a study of this relief proposal. We tell you further that the Government has already refinanced nearly every other major industry at a rate of interest no higher than this and upon security not half as good. And we also remind you that the Government has refinanced foreign countries by lending to them the people's money at even a lower rate and upon no security at all.

Under the Frazier bill the farmer not only can but he will repay all of his loan. That is the peculiar merit of the Frazier bill, and that is a feature that is exclusive in it. Few people believe the banks and the railroads and the other financial institutions which the Government has refinanced will repay all of their loans. As to our foreign loans, we have already trimmed the principal down to almost nothing and nobody seriously thinks we will get back even that.

The Frazier bill is not only the soundest plan for the Federal refinancing of farm indebtedness—and I dare say there is not a single Member of this House who does not agree that the Government must undertake this refinancing under some plan—but it is also the most honest proposal that has been made. There is no camouflage in it. Everybody can understand it. And that is more than can be said for the pending bill. The only people who can understand that bill are the bankers and the theorists who drew it, and they have succeeded so far in keeping their identity a secret.

Moreover, under the Frazier bill the refinancing of farm indebtedness by the issuance of Federal Reserve notes secured by the farm-loan bonds, which are held by the Government itself, will not cost the taxpayers of the country a single dollar. On the other hand, the Government must necessarily profit through the refinancing. But under the administration's bill the taxpayer will have saddled upon him a tax debt from which he may never escape. Hundreds of millions of dollars under that plan will be loaned by the Government through the same system which has already proved itself a failure and at a rate of interest which the farmer cannot pay. The pending bill proposes that these bonds be sold to the bankers and others and that the Government guarantee the interest. The bill should be called an act for the relief of the bankers and the bondholders, instead of the farmer. For who will pay that guaranteed interest when the farmer defaults under the interest load, as many of them have already defaulted on similar Government farm loans? The taxpayer will pay the interest, of course. And that is what the banker and the bondholder want.

Mr. Chairman, there is no room for serious argument as between the merits of the Frazier bill and this one. That is tacitly admitted by the majority here. In all the discussion which has taken place no one has attempted to advance a single argument either against the Frazier bill or as to why the administration's bill should be preferred to it. Not a gentleman present will contradict me when I say that there have been only two reasons advanced in favor of this bill. The first is that it is the administration's bill, and the second is that it will do some good and that it is better than nothing. And the only word that has been uttered against the substitution of the Frazier bill for this one is that the pending bill has the approval of the President and the Frazier bill has not.

In view of such an argument may I be so bold as to suggest that in my humble opinion the time has arrived when the Congress of the United States should do a little thinking and a little functioning as a legislative body on its own account. I think it is time for us to consider whether the combined thought of the farm leaders of the country, the declarations of the legislatures of 21 States of the Nation, and the views of the majority of gentlemen here who represent the agricultural communities may not be as sound upon a specific proposal for farm relief as the views of the President and his unknown advisers who drafted this bill.

I hope the motion to recommit may prevail and that the committee may decide to substitute the Frazier bill for the pending measure. If it does, we will then have given to the farmer what has been so long denied him—security and happiness for the present and renewed hope for the dawning of a better and a brighter day. [Applause.]

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, until I heard the Blanton-Bloom controversy a moment ago I had not decided to avail myself of this time, but since that seems to be the order of the day I have reconsidered somewhat, and I take this opportunity to express my attitude on a particular thing that is going on in this country at this time.

We are discussing agricultural relief, and I will say to my friends that the other day I voted against the gag rule. It was not because I was against the bill, for I am going to vote for the bill. I think the bill can do some good. The only reason I had is that I personally would like to see all the vacant seats filled when you are discussing the bill. The minute a bill comes up under a gag rule everybody goes fishing or to a baseball game, and in fact I would like to be there myself. [Laughter.]

If we had not adopted this gag rule, we would be reading this bill line by line, paragraph by paragraph, and discussing and considering the measure.

Mr. HOEPPEL. And we would be earning our compensation.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I will not admit that, for I do not know whether we would be earning our compensation or not.

What I started to say was this: This bill is susceptible of being a good measure. It depends upon the hands into which it happens to fall. If it falls into the same sort of hands into which our banking bill fell, which was the first measure we passed, then it is doomed to failure and we might as well step on it now. I got word yesterday from one of the best business men in my town calling attention to the fact that for the week ending April 5 the Federal Reserve System of this country had called during that week $200,000,000 of their outstanding loans.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. Will not the gentleman admit that the outlook is more hopeful since the resignation of Eugene Meyer?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Oh, I got up this morning with a hopeful feeling that he had really resigned, but I interviewed some newspaper correspondents, and they said that they had not been able to verify it yet. I have no hope until I know definitely that he is out of the way. Anyway, it makes no difference who takes his place, and unless that man and that body of men feel differently, you might as well seal up this thing and go back home and get ready for the collapse. You cannot bleed the country like the leech doctors used to bleed their patients and expect the country to recover. That was the old system. The leech doctor would suck the blood out of the weak patient and expect him to get well. The modern system is to give the patient a blood transfusion. We have been doctored by leech doctors, and when we wanted blood in our economic structure they simply attached their tentacles to the structure and in 1 week they sucked $200,000,000 out of the credit of the country at a time when everybody is broke. We will have the report on Friday of the next week and see how much they have sucked out during that time.

What we need is a high-class, modern surgeon who believes in blood transfusion, and we should get rid of these leech doctors who have been sucking the sustenance out of the country for quite a long time. [Applause.]

I will say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], if the fellow to whom he refers and his associates have not resigned, I think we ought to organize a good old Kentucky band of night riders and go out and induce them to believe that they must resign. I did not know until yesterday that they have over here in the Federal Treasury lying idle a gold reserve from which could be poured into the economic veins of this country $3,175,000,000 of money. You do not need to float any fiat money. The gold reserve is there. It is blood that could be transfused and poured into the veins of commerce, but it is not being done, because the men in charge of that Reserve System are not in sympathy with the bill that we passed here as the first act of this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL].

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I am one of the many Members of this House who thought they were doing something constructive when they voted to permit this bill to be considered by the Agricultural Committee. The thought that came to me was that the Banking and Currency Committee was too closely connected with the bankers of America, and we were led to believe that if the Agricultural Committee could handle this bill, there would be some humane proposition advanced, which would be acceptable to all the farmers of America. The chairman of the committee reporting this bill, as late as yesterday, admitted that there were defects in this bill. He said that it is "the best that could be done." What does that mean? Does it mean that the members of this Agricultural Committee are unable to function? Does it mean that they are under certain coercive action which prevents them from bringing to us measures which are constructive and in the interest of the farmer? Why could they not also bring out to us the Frazier bill? Before I conclude I shall show you definitely and positively, if my time permits, that we can lend money to the American farmer at not to exceed 2½ percent interest without inflation of currency and without the flotation of bonds which are tax-exempt.

This present farm bill is, in a measure and to a limited extent, a semblance of relief to the farmer. It takes from one of his shoulders a mortgage debt on which he cannot now pay the interest and transfers that debt to the other shoulder with a little bit of soft packing and padding under the moratorium idea. But, nevertheless, he has to continue to carry that debt for years to come at approximately the same interest. To protect the bankers and insurance companies on their farm loans the Government in this bill guarantees interest payments to these money lenders at the expense of the taxpayers. This bill, if enacted, will be wonderful music to the bankers, and their plaudits will reach to the sky. Even at this very moment it is probable that the spirit of Lucifer is hovering over the Capitol and with his cohorts singing the praises of this bill, the refrain being echoed by the bankers and their representatives. The voice of Gabriel pleading for the distressed, impoverished citizen is silenced by their plutocratic song.

The farmers are opposed to this bill. I attended numerous meetings of farmers, and have had correspondence from all over the United States. I am not a farmer and do not represent a farming community, but I know this proposition is unfair; it does not reach far enough, even though it were justified. You are proposing to help only 20 percent of the men who are in debt, which is wrong.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. I observed that the gentleman did not vote for the rule yesterday which made amendments impossible. I take it the reason that he did not is because he wanted some chance to better the bill as he is suggesting today.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Absolutely. I am going to vote against this bill. I am here to represent my constituency. They sent me here with a definite idea. I am not going to follow any gag rule, regardless of who submits it. The bankers of America want more tax-exempt securities, to bear the people down with additional taxes. It is unfair, and we certainly should not subscribe to it.

There has not been one constructive measure, except, perhaps, the beer bill, that has been put through this session of Congress. We new men, especially, have been handed a kaleidoscope. All we have been seeing is colored promises—promises and more promises. The people of America have seen nothing but promises. What we want is a clear-vision telescope. We want to point our eyes to Wall Street and those international bankers, and we want to do something for the American people which is constructive. We have been given too much colored taffy. You know when you get too much of one thing you eventually tire of it. The American people are getting a little apprehensive about the "new deal." The "new deal", in my opinion, is taking on the character of a raw deal, the most peculiar deal which has ever been handed to the American people. I wish the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] were here. He wanted a constructive amendment. I will give him one, and it is absolutely workable. It is working today.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL] has expired.

Mr. DOXEY. I yield the gentleman from California 1 additional minute.

Mr. HOEPPEL. The bankers of America are today receiving $45,000,000 subsidy due to our postal savings laws. They have borrowed $1,000,000,000 from this Nation.

If the restriction on deposits were removed and the methods of withdrawal liberalized, we would have from $5,000,000,000 to $10,000,000,000 on deposit almost overnight; and with the funds thus at hand we could extend direct credit to the distressed citizens and home owners at a rate of interest not to exceed 2½ percent.

The bill under consideration, in my opinion, bears all the earmarks of entrenched finance and until our Congress recognizes the full and complete right of the farmer and home owner, I must decline to vote for this futile gesture of mortgage relief.

Stabilization of finance, under Government ownership or control, will bring confidence in place of the rising tide of despair.

I say liberalize the postal savings laws. This will bring all the money out of hoarding and there will be billions of dollars in the Post Office Department which can be loaned to the farmer and the home owners of America for 2½ percent. [Applause.] I only hope that this information is transmitted to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], who desired a constructive amendment to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOPE. I yield the gentleman from California 1 additional minute in order to answer the question of the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Do I understand the gentleman does not approve of any of these emergency matters that have been passed, except the beer bill?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I voted against every measure presented here except one measure, which I considered an emergency, and that was the banking relief bill, which I still contend was engineered by Wall Street. It was submitted at the proper time, so that it would intimidate the new Members and some old Members.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Then the gentleman disapproves of everything that has been done except the passage of the beer bill?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I voted for the beer bill. I am not going to vote for a halfway measure. If you will bring forward a farm bill which will give the American farmer a rate of interest which is proper and fair, I will vote for it, but I will not vote to let the bankers of America continue to turn the mortgage wheel and clip the interest coupons which all of us as taxpayers ultimately must pay. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, I have noticed that in most of the addresses which come from the opposition or the minority a great deal of stress was laid on the fact that the newer Members of the House, particularly of the majority party, were restive under the present so-called "situation" whereby we are passing measures under what are known as "gag rules". The talk I have listened to on this bill has been principally rhetoric, and I think the farmer is entitled to a little more than that. He ought to get a little relief. Our opposition in the prior administration did relieve him of everything he had. He did not get relief, but he got relieved. They passed a so-called "bill to help the farmer", and we know what it did to him. It took his shirt.

A great many people have talked about what could be done if we were given an opportunity to amend the present bill. It would look like Jacob's coat of many colors if that had happened. Anyone who has a constructive amendment for this bill has been invited to present it to the Committee on Agriculture, and they have said they will give it consideration. I sincerely hope that anybody who has any kind of amendment will follow that course. It is all very well to get up here and discuss the Frazier bill. I think it is a very fine measure, but unfortunately we are not considering the Frazier bill. We are considering a measure that has been suggested by the President of the United States, and we are now here talking about that. So while the Frazier bill may have all the merits that its proponents claim for it, it is not the bill under consideration at the present time, and I believe it is our duty as Representatives to confine our remarks to the measure which we are at the present time debating.

Now, as far as this bill coming from the Committee on Agriculture is concerned, I voted to send it to the Committee on Banking and Currency because I thought that is where it belonged by the very nature of its make-up; but it was sent to the Committee on Agriculture, and I am happy to say I think they have made a fairly good job of it. If the farmers of the United States are given the benefit of 1½ percent on their interest charges it will amount to approximately $180,000,000 of relief. That is some measure of relief at this time. I for one am going to support it with my vote, and I hope that every Member of the majority and as many of the minority as can find it in themselves to do so will do likewise, and I shall not vote to recommit. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD] has expired.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DEEN].

Mr. DEEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall appreciate it if you will permit me to digress for a moment from the bill. Of course, I shall vote for the bill; I am for it.

The majority of us are here as representatives to consider the best interests of all the people. I feel that the majority of the Membership of this House is trying to do the best they can for the people.

Whether others agree with me or disagree there is, in my judgment, but one thing that will bring relief to the farmers of the Nation. I am a humble farmer. I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but let me say that until both Houses of Congress go back to the Constitution and find the clause which states that Congress shall have the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof the farmers will not get relief. [Applause.]

In 117 speeches in the 20 counties of my district I declared to the people in that section of Georgia that I was informed from Washington that 89 percent of the wealth of this country was in the hands of 11 percent of the people, by title, deed, or otherwise.

I remember the statement of the historians that when the Roman Empire had reached its zenith in the year 73 A.D., and crumbled, 12 percent of the people of that great Empire owned and controlled at least 79 percent of the total assets under their system of land ownership.

I happen to be a humble newspaperman. Two years ago, without drastically criticizing the Congress of the United States, I stated in an editorial, and I now repeat it, that in my judgment when Congress passes temporary measures, such as this, it but places over a cancer a little plaster of salve.

Listen to me and mark my prediction. I am loyal to the flag for which I fought during the war, left the position to which I had been elected, left a good salary, left my wife and served for $30 a month. Under weight, I could not get in the Regular Army, but went as a Y.M.C.A. secretary and will do so again, but listen to me: The farmers of this Nation are not going to stand always what they are standing now. Abraham Lincoln abolished chattel slavery, but there has been forced upon the farmers who are the pride of our Nation a form of economic slavery and serfdom. They will not suffer always without rebellion.

I resent Wall Street, or any other street, undertaking to finance the farmers of the United States with the crumbs that trickle down from a well-spread table. The poor, poverty-stricken farmers of this country barely get the crumbs that fall from this table. [Applause.]

I have voted for all Mr. Roosevelt's measures except the beer bill. By a platform written 3 weeks before the national Democratic platform was written I was prevented from voting for that measure except by violation of my platform. I will vote for his measures. I am for the Commander in Chief of the Army, the leader in this great war; I am for Mr. Roosevelt; I am for the Democratic Party; and I am for the side of right in this battle we are fighting.

However important a part loyalty may play in the battle in which we are engaged today, mark this prediction: I am not a prophet, but unless Congress enacts some legislation that will put money in circulation, that will take care of the farmers' troubles, the farmers themselves will do it, and they will not be long about it.

I am cooperating and trying to do my part for my people and for your people in this economic war. Tragedy will mark our destiny if we fail to carry out the duty incumbent upon us. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who just spoke said he wanted to do something for the farmers of this Nation; that he wanted to get more money in circulation. Then why does he not help us pass the Frazier bill? [Applause.] He will then do something for the farmers of this Nation and he will get some money in circulation, not through Wall Street and the international bankers but through the Government by refinancing farm indebtedness and thus assisting the farmers.

The gentleman from Texas asked the farm representatives here whether they wished to take their farm relief from Italy. I shall answer most emphatically "No"; neither do we want to take our refinancing of farm indebtedness from the "Brain Trust" or from an overscholastic professor of New York, brought up and trained in the atmosphere of coupon clippers. That is where this so-called "farm refinance bill", here under discussion, was born. I know because I saw the original of it on January 10 last in New York.

Now let us come down to the issues. Nothing in this world is permanent but change. Our civilization is in a transition—from a world of plenty to a world of want—millions starving in the midst of plenty. And why? Because we have not enough money with which to do the Nation's business—with which to measure the muscular and brain energy of our people. Give the people enough money with which to do the business of the Nation and we ask no further farm relief. Then our farm products will rise in price overnight; on this proposition I am sure we all agree.

We have everything that is necessary to end this depression and bring about prosperity. We have too much to eat and yet millions are starving; we have too much raw material of every kind and have millions upon millions of human wants, and then we have millions out of employment that want to take this raw material and put it into the finished products to satisfy those wants; and yet this great American machine is stalling. Why? Because we have not enough money with which to measure the muscular and brain energy of one another—a sufficient medium, unit, of exchange is all we need. Give us the Frazier bill, the Patman bill, and the Wheeler bill, and then let us adjourn and go home and then we will have prosperity.

We are becoming a nation of Indians, a nation of trade and barter. Over 2,000 cities in this Nation have tried, or are using, scrip or some other medium of exchange because the Government of the United States has not enough intelligence to give us a sufficient medium of exchange—sufficient money to do the Nation's business. In North Dakota a year ago we, in the eastern part, took all our old clothes and sent them to the people of western North Dakota and eastern Montana because there they had a complete crop failure, but unless something is done for agriculture we will have to ask those people to return those clothes to us. We need them, and we have no money with which to buy new. Yet the previous administration asked you cotton growers of the South to destroy every third row of cotton when nearly every man, woman, and child needed new clothes. Our difficulty is that we have not enough money with which to do business—not enough units of exchange, yardsticks, with which to measure the muscular and brain energy of our people.

How did this situation come about? It was brought about by doubling the money in actual circulation during the war. The Government printed about 2,000,000,000 new Federal Reserve notes. It did not give this to the international bankers, but to the local bankers throughout the Nation, who gave it to the people of this Nation with which to buy Liberty bonds. With this 2,000,000,000 as a revolving fund we bought 22,000,000 of Liberty bonds, and then Wall Street and the international bankers by skillful manipulation took the 15 billion that they had bet on the wrong horse over in Europe before we entered the War out of this 22,000,000,000. There is the beginning of this depression.

We have talked here about gag rule. I have discovered that the gag rule is a dangerous thing to play with. The Republicans, it was said yesterday, misused it and you Democrats said you were going to use it in the interest of the people. I hope you will, but you are not doing it with this monstrosity, the so-called "farm refinance bill", that you are trying to push down our throats without the right of amendment. You are not doing it in this case, and I am going to make this prediction—this gag rule will burn your fingers the same as it burned the Republicans' fingers, and you will throw back that gag rule to the Republicans in about 2 years from now. You cannot use that rule successfully unless you use it for the best interest of the people of this Nation, and so far you have used it not in doing something for the people but in doing something to them. That is all you have done with this rule during this session of Congress.

Let us now come to the remedy, the Frazier bill. The Frazier bill provides that the United States Government shall refinance existing farm indebtedness at 1½ percent interest and 1½ percent principal on the amortization plan, not by issuing bonds but by issuing Federal Reserve notes secured by the best securities on earth, first mortgages on farm lands, better security than gold or silver because you cannot eat gold or silver, but you can eat products that grow on the farm, therefore your life depends upon the farm—it is the best security on the face of the earth. If our Government has enough intelligence to do this, it will make a profit of $6,345,000,000 at 1½ percent interest in 47 years, the time required for amortization.

Let us compare the Frazier bill with the one under discussion, written in New York by a scholastic college professor who was brought up in the atmosphere of money changers. Under this bill, if all the farm indebtedness is refinanced, the farmers of this Nation will pay $12,492,500,000 in 39 years to the coupon clippers. The difference that the farmers will have to pay in interest between the Frazier bill in 47 years and under this bill in 39 years is $6,147,500,000. Under the Frazier bill the Government will make a profit of $6,345,000,000, and to that extent lessen the taxes that we will have to pay, while under this bill the coupon clippers will make a profit of $12,492,500,000.

In addition, if you pass this bill and if all the farmers of this Nation take advantage of it and refinance their farm indebtedness, they will have to pay $47,500,000 for stock in the Federal land bank. This, you propose to, by issuing additional tax-exempt bonds, when this Government already has 21,000,000,000 tax-exempt bonds and certificates of indebtedness outstanding. This is the price you are asking the farmers and the people of this Nation to pay in order to make the Federal land bank and the joint-stock land bank bonds good. This is the bill, with its scholastic birth in New York, that you ask us western farm representatives to take and close our eyes and say that it will help the farmers, but we know and you know that it will do nothing of the kind. It is not real, but make-believe legislation. It is the name, but not the substance, of the relief that we were given to understand we would get during the campaign. You are simply muddying the water.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. How many farmers in North Dakota with mortgages now on their farms does the gentleman think will be benefited by this measure?

Mr. LEMKE. About one half of the farmers of my State have already lost their farms and homes, and the other half will lose them under this bill, because it limits the loans to 50 percent of the value of the farms, when in my State and in other Western and Midwestern States the farms are now mortgaged up to 100 percent of their value. The Frazier bill permits loans to be made to an amount equal to the fair value of such farms and 50 percent of the insurable buildings and improvements thereon.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Is the gentleman voting against the bill?

Mr. LEMKE. We are going to try to send it back to the Committee on Agriculture and to help them make a real bill out of it. I know the gentlemen over here will help us to do this. The gentleman who spoke just before me said we should offer amendments to the committee. I will offer one. Strike out everything after the name of Mr. Jones and substitute the Frazier bill, and then you will have a real good amendment. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LUNDEEN. But in case the motion to recommit loses, will the gentleman vote for the bill?

Mr. LEMKE. I do not know yet. It is too early to say. I want to consider that. I may say that if I conclude that it will give us a toe hold so we can twist that toe until we get a strangle hold I may vote for it. [Laughter.]

But the Frazier bill will pass. This fearful depression must be brought to an abrupt end. If we have not the intelligence or the courage to save this Nation from destruction, then our successors will. I am satisfied that you will join with us in sending this bill back to the committee. I am satisfied you will do this, because you have said that you wanted to do something for the farmers, that you wanted to increase the money in circulation. The Frazier bill will do both. No one who has spoken in favor of the bill here under discussion has any confidence in it. The most that you have dared to say in its favor is that you think it will do some good. In other words, you are apologizing for yourselves so as to ease your conscience sufficiently to vote for it. This bill will do no substantial good; and if you pass it, there is grave danger that the farmers of this Nation will unite with the unemployed and hungry laboring men and go on a strike and starve this Congress and the executive department of this Nation into giving them something real and not make-believe. If they do this, we cannot blame them. They have been pounding away at our doors long enough—their patience is about exhausted.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. What is the use of giving the farmers a toe hold under this bill when the coupon clippers already have a scissors hold?

Mr. LEMKE. I hope they will cut their fingers in place of cutting billions in coupons out of the misery of millions.

Twenty-one States have petitioned Congress to pass the Frazier bill, and if you do not do this we will have to make it a part of the Constitution—we will get three fourths of the States in favor of it. Not only have 21 States asked you to pass the Frazier bill but the farm representatives of 21 States were here the other day and they unanimously rejected this bill. They voted unanimously that they had sooner have no bill than to take this monstrosity.

Oh, you say, "follow the leader." When I was a youngster I used to play "follow the leader", but I came to grief so often that later, when I got older and was asked to follow the leader, I asked, "Where to?" [Applause.]

I hope this House will rerefer this bill to the Committee on Agriculture with instruction to substitute the Frazier bill. The Frazier bill is now before this committee. I introduced it on March 10, and it has been before the Committee on Agriculture since that date. It is before that committee now—that committee is the appropriate committee. I am proud that I assisted in referring to the Committee on Agriculture the President's message dealing with this subject. I know that that committee is friendly to agriculture. We do not know what would have happened if the message had gone to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I am sure if we rerefer this bill to the Committee on Agriculture, that when it comes out again it will be a real bill.

You say, "follow the leader." I say, follow the leadership of the people of the United States of America. [Applause.] The people of this Nation are greater than any man that ever occupied the White House. Let us do that which is right. Let us protect our great leader from making a mistake. Let us break through the brain trust. I know that our President is sympathetic. I know he wants to do something for the farmers and all the people of this Nation, because he so stated in his speeches and in his inaugural address. Let us not be mere "yes" men, but rather lend him the assistance and guidance that the people of this Nation expect us to and that he is entitled to and should receive from us.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. I will.

Mr. PATMAN. Some suggestion was made yesterday that certain farm leaders were not working in the interest of the farmer. Something was said about Mr. Simpson. I wish the gentleman would give us his opinion as to Mr. Simpson's work in this matter.

Mr. LEMKE. John A. Simpson is one of the real farm leaders. He represents the hope and aspiration of at least 85 percent of all the farmers of this Nation and numbers his friends in the millions among the business and professional men and women of this Nation. His monthly radio addresses are eagerly awaited and listened to by 10 to 15 million each month. No other farm leader knows the farm problem as John Simpson. He does not belong to the high-salaried, silk-stocking, tax-eating brigade of so-called "farm leaders" and is not a "yes" man.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. Yes.

Mr. GLOVER. I happen to be on the Agricultural Committee. We had the leaders you speak of before our committee, and I say to the gentleman that the farm organizations employed their own counsel. They had one man there to represent them in the agricultural bill that we passed. We passed the bill that they wanted, and it is over in the Senate now.

Mr. LEMKE. What you had was a Farm Bureau lawyer. The Farm Union withdrew, and my friend Simpson at one of those meetings said, "Gentlemen, the farmers may go to the hot place, but we refuse to take that route."

Mr. GLOVER. I do know that the statement was made to us that Mr. Lee, who was there as their counsel, was authorized to speak for the farm organization.

Mr. LEMKE. For some of them.

Mr. GLOVER. And they wrote the bill.

Mr. LEMKE. No; the bill was written in New York.

Mr. GLOVER. I know it was not all written there.

Mr. LEMKE. You mean the agricultural emergency bill was amended; that is true. It was also written in New York and rewritten by Mr. Lee, the attorney here, but the refinance bill that is under discussion here was written in Ithaca, N.Y. I know, because I and my friend Mr. Talbott, president of the Farmers' Union of North Dakota, saw it and read it in New York on January 10, and again here in Senator FRAZIER'S office on January 12 last. It has also been amended, because the language that we used when we discussed it with its author in Senator FRAZIER'S office you would not care to use in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and since that time it has been somewhat improved. We talked direct to the author of the bill in Senator FRAZIER'S office, and if you want me to name him I will do so.

A MEMBER. Who was he?

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Myer, of the Agricultural College at Ithaca, N.Y.—not Eugene Meyer.

Mr. GLOVER. I will say to the gentleman that in my whole life I never heard that man's name in connection with this bill.

Mr. LEMKE. We read the bill in New York on Tuesday, January 10, and met its author here in Senator FRAZIER'S office on Thursday, January 12 last; and I am informed that the gentleman appeared and testified before the Agricultural Committee of the House while this bill was under consideration.

Mr. GLOVER. I will say to the gentleman, further than that, that some of the farm representatives or those that are interested in this administration were there before us, and they advocated this and it is advocated by the administration. It is an administration bill.

Mr. LEMKE. I know it is advocated as an administration bill, as many other bills here have been advocated; but it does not represent the hopes and the aspirations of the farmers of this Nation. It does not give farm relief. It is make-believe, and I am confident that when the administration knows the truth concerning this legislation it will not insist upon it. The farmers of this Nation have a right to object to having New York professors writing the farm legislation.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. How much money will it take to refinance all of the farm mortgages in this country?

Mr. LEMKE. Under the Frazier bill——

Mr. TRUAX. No; how much money will it take?

Mr. LEMKE. By issuing bonds, about $9,500,000,000. This indebtedness has been scaled down by mortgage foreclosures to about $8,500,000,000, but under the provisions of the Frazier bill, those who have already lost their homes by mortgage foreclosures since 1919, are allowed to buy them back or to buy similar homes and get the benefit of the bill.

Mr. TRUAX. I read now from page 5 of the report, paragraph 3.

To enable the farmer to redeem or repurchase a farm home lost by him, through forced sale or voluntarily alienated to discharge mortgage indebtedness, within 2 years prior to the date of the enactment of the act or hereafter.

Mr. LEMKE. But the Frazier bill provides that anybody who lost his farm by mortgage foreclosure since 1919 should be helped.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. Yes.

Mr. GLOVER. I will ask the gentleman how the Frazier bill or any other bill can take care of mortgages that have been foreclosed and bought in by other individuals and the title vested in them 13 years ago. How could you do that?

Mr. LEMKE. We say that he can buy his own farm back if he can get it; and if he cannot, then he can get a similar one.

Mr. GLOVER. The gentleman does not mean to say to this House that he can do that, or that any law could be passed under which he could do it and take it out of the hands of the purchaser?

Mr. LEMKE. Not unless the purchaser wants to get rid of it; and if he does not, then the farmer can buy a similar farm, and the Frazier bill will let him do that.

Mr. GLOVER. But the Frazier bill cannot reach that.

Mr. LEMKE. It does.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman has stated it will take $9,000,000,000 of bonds.

Mr. LEMKE. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. Yesterday I said I was for the Frazier bill. Would not the gentleman support a plan that would provide $2,000,000,000 and then pass the Frazier bill, or a similar bill, perhaps by some other name, that would provide $7,000,000,000 more by an expansion of the currency?

Mr. LEMKE. I absolutely agree with the gentleman, because we have not had money enough to do the business of this Nation for years. We have been check-kiters. We have kited checks and every once in a while they come back "not sufficient funds." That means not enough money. The bankers are better check-kiters than you or I, because they kite them so fast that with only $680,000,000 actual money in all the banks and trust companies of the United States——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE] has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. LEMKE. They kited checks so fast that they had only $680,000,000 in all the banks and trust companies of the United States, and 42 billion on deposit. In other words, they could roll $1 around to do the work of $62, and a condition of that kind is not safe.

Now, in conclusion, if we will pass the Frazier bill, the Patman bill, and the Wheeler bill, and go home, then we will have no more unemployment. This Nation will again be prosperous. We will have met the hopes and aspirations of the people who are starving. That is what we can do and have real legislation. Let us not fail the people's expectations. The Hoover administration failed and a tornado hit the Republican Party on November 8. You on this side, should not repeat the mistake and also be hit by a tornado. I am with you. I will say the finest bunch of men that I have ever met anywhere in the United States are here in this Congress. Let us do something real. Let us meet the demands of the people of this Nation, and forget all about the coupon clippers and bondholders. [Applause.]

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LEMKE. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. An average of 3,000 farmers are losing their farms every day. Is it not wise to pass this bill immediately and get some of those farmers so that they can hold their farms? I am for the Patman and for the Frazier bills and for any reasonable expansion of the currency that can be brought onto this floor, but I want to do something now for those people who are losing their all, the savings of a lifetime.

Mr. LEMKE. So do I. Let us send this bill back to the committee and get it back here by Saturday. It is easy. The Frazier bill has been discussed so long there is no need of further discussion. It is a question of whether we are for it or against it. I am satisfied from my conversation with Members of this House that a majority are for it if they are free from restraint, and I say it is time that we considered the people of this great Nation rather than party lines. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has again expired.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON].

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Chairman, I think we can all agree on one thing—that there can be no restoration of prosperity until the farmer is taken care of. However, under our rules we are not permitted to participate in the necessary legislation.

If Cervantes had lived in this period instead of 400 years ago, he could have drawn his characters from this body instead of from characters of his period. Here he would have found his Don Quixotes and his Sancho Panzas in the flesh.

The rule we are operating under in passing this important measure to relieve agriculture even denies the Members of this House the privilege of offering amendments two degrees removed from the measure itself. The rule first provides that only the committee may offer an amendment, and it then goes farther and prohibits the individual Members from offering an amendment to the amendments offered by the committee. The committee took a week to consider the bill. It held some public hearings, but most of them were closed and private. It now brings the measure before the House under the nefarious rule I have spoken of.

If you will stop to think, you will realize that the committee is in absolute control of its own work. The committee should cease to function as a controlling body after it reports a bill to the entire Membership of the House meeting as a Committee of the Whole. But in the meantime a rule has been adopted which bars the individual Membership of this body from offering amendments of any kind and confers upon the Agricultural Committee the exclusive right of offering amendments.

We have many distinguished men in this body, educators, if you please, who might wish to amend the bill in a minor way, who might wish to suggest the placement of a comma or a period and improve its construction. But the rule is so drastic that even this cannot be done.

We become, all of us, Sancho Panzas, doing duty to our Don Quixote, the Committee on Agriculture. I insist that the illusions of the ancient Don Quixote, when he was shooting the windmills and Sancho Panza was applauding him for shooting down the enemy, were no greater than are our illusions if we feel that we are participating in the preparation of this bill. The speeches we are making here constitute windmill talk.

We should be ashamed to sit here, 435 Members sent here to represent the people of the United States, and permit this procedure, and then say this is a representative Government. [Applause.]

Alexander Hamilton did not trust the people. He said they were not fit to rule. We Jeffersonians do not even trust the chosen representatives of the people. We have an inner circle within the House organization that gives us measures to pass, and all they leave for us to do is to vote yes or no on them.

With much chagrin I listened yesterday to the statement, in defense of our conduct, that we are doing this because the Republicans did it for 10 years. That, of course, means that we want to cure a wrong by continuing to practice it. I want to say that the wrong is far greater, practiced by us at this time, after the years of our condemnation of it, than it was when practiced by the other side, for we have had notice and know wherein the evil lies.

The Constitution provides a function for this body. We at least ought to insist upon a semblance of conformity to its provisions.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Missouri 1 additional minute.

Mr. SHANNON. I once made a speech before the Missouri Legislature in which I jestingly said something about tumblebugs and Congressmen. Now I think I shall have to make another one and apologize to the tumblebugs for referring to them. [Applause.]

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCFARLANE].

REAL FARM RELIEF BADLY NEEDED

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I did not know until just a short while ago that I would be allowed any time on this bill.

I agree heartily with the sentiments expressed on the floor yesterday and today by most of the Members to the effect that we ought to bring out some real farm legislation at this session of Congress. We are all here for this purpose, but I know, and you know, that the bill we are considering this afternoon does not give to the farmers of our country the relief they are entitled to receive.

HIGH INTEREST RATES

The interest rates are 4 percent plus amortization, inspection, and so forth, which will probably mean the farmer will pay 6 percent for his loan, and this he cannot do unless he receives more for his products. Farm mortgages should be refinanced at not to exceed 3-percent interest through controlled expansion of the currency and not through the bond feature of this bill, under which the Government guarantees the interest. Farm indebtedness now amounts to about $12,000,000,000 and the provisions of this bill are wholly inadequate to give the relief needed.

WHO DREW THE BILL?

Now, I do not know who is speaking for the administration or who the "brain trust" is that we have heard referred to so much on this floor this afternoon, but it seems that this bill is sent down by somebody. We hear rumors from first one and then another that three or four lawyers for the land banks have been instrumental in drawing this measure. The gentleman from Minnesota seems to think that Mr. Meyer, of New York, drew it. Regardless of who drew this measure, according to the sentiment expressed by the various Members who have spoken on it, it does not meet their ideas of correct farm-mortgage legislation. Read section 1 of the bill. What does it say? It says we are providing here for $2,000,000,000 for farm-loan bonds, with a maximum of 4-percent interest, which, of course, will be the minimum. We will be paying to the purchasers of these bonds $80,000,000 annually, and by this bill the interest is guaranteed by our Government. It would not be paid if it were not guaranteed. I know and you know, perhaps, very little of it would be paid, because certainly under present conditions if we cannot raise the commodity-price level, the farmers of the country cannot earn enough to pay the interest. If they cannot, how does this bill help them? How can the farmers be helped if we cannot raise prices so the farmer can live, pay his debts, taxes, and pay interest on his debts?

WILL FARMERS OR LAND BANKS BE BENEFITED

The farmer is not asking for any particular favors. He is asking merely for a chance to pull himself out and save his property. Does this bill do it? You heard the discussion of the distinguished Member from Virginia this afternoon. His statements have not been seriously questioned. If his diagnosis of the measure is true, this is a measure which certainly, in many of its particulars, is designed for the benefit of the land banks and will be worth millions of dollars to them in profits; yet we sit idly by knowing this is in the bill and say we can do nothing about it. What kind of a spell has hypnotized this Congress that we sit supinely by and enact legislation of this kind when we conscientiously in our own hearts and minds do not believe it meets the requirements it should meet?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. Does not the gentleman realize that rules such as have been brought in, in connection with these bills by the majority party, cause the break-down of constitutional government?

Mr. McFARLANE. Answering the gentleman from Pennsylvania, let me say that yesterday we heard the Alphonse-Gaston comedy being passed back and forth from each side of the aisle. We were told that for 12 years the Republican Party had brought in similar rules for the enactment of the legislation that has probably very largely placed us in the deplorable condition in which we now find ourselves. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEIDEMAN].

DIRECT CREDITS AUTHORIZED BY FARM BILL

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, while I cannot be classified as a farmer, I may say to the Members of the House and to the farmers of the Nation that title III of this bill, on page 17 of this print of the bill, providing for direct credits, is a move in the right direction for the relief of the farmer and toward the elimination of the private money lender.

While we can concede that this bill is not all that any of us want, the provisions which allow for the refinancing of either first or second mortgages directly by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is the direction in which you Members from Minnesota and the Dakotas and all Progressives want to go. This is why I am going to vote for this bill. It gives nearly as much as the Frazier bill. True, it provides for a little higher interest charge, but at least it gets us started somewhere, and, having started, we do not want to stop in the middle of the road and argue.

I hope that the administration of this act will be different from the administration of the unemployment-relief measure, the Reforestation Act. In metropolitan cities they are recruiting armies of boys from 18 to 25 years of age, while the veterans of the Nation, the men who fought overseas, the men who served their country for 2 or 3 years in time of war, are denied the privilege of working for even $30 a month. It was not the intention of Congress when it passed the reforestation bill that any one class should be favored in its operation, but that the provisions of the bill be applied fairly and equitably among all needy and willing persons who should apply for work.

I say this should be brought to the attention of the administration, and I demand that it be fairly administered. The present method of apportioning work under this bill is an insult to the ex-service man and it is an insult to the married man. Boys 18 years old could not serve overseas or anywhere else years ago and now are given the exclusive right to work. The privilege should be given to all.

I hope the administration of the bill we are now considering will be more equitably worked out than the so-called "reforestation bill." I am suspicious of the recruiting of these boys from 18 to 25 years of age, leaving married men to starve to death, and leaving to starve men who were willing to sacrifice their lives on the altar of patriotism. Today these very same men are denied the privilege of even working for a measly $30 a month. I want to call this to the attention of the administrators of this bill.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I yield.

Mr. GLOVER. If the gentleman will read today's papers, he will find that the rule has been changed and that older men are being recruited if they have families or dependents.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Yes. I just talked with Detroit over long-distance telephone 15 minutes ago. I talked to two men whom I know personally. They had just left the welfare department of the city of Detroit and had been denied the permission even to file for this work. This is more recent information than that of the gentleman from Arkansas, but I hope that he is correct. [Applause.]

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I want to appeal to the Members from the cities to not only support this bill, but any bill that has for its objective the improvement of agricultural conditions in this country. I disagree with some of the Members who feel this bill has not received at least reasonable consideration. This, of course, is an emergency session of Congress. We have many important committees of the House that are not holding meetings simply because they have no emergency legislation to consider, but some of the legislation we have so far considered of an emergency nature has not been considered as thoroughly as has this legislation. Let us, for example, compare the consideration given this bill with the consideration given the so-called "economy bill" which has been denounced and criticized by some Members who have preceded me.

The Economy Committee reported a bill which they themselves admitted was given very meager consideration. The bill was presented in the House on Friday, and at 10 o'clock the next morning a Democratic caucus was called, and only after the caucus was assembled were we given copies of the bill. Shortly after 12 o'clock we were called upon to vote on the bill, without even time to consider it. All the time that was given out was given out by those who were in favor of the bill, so that no detailed examination or discussion was permitted those who opposed the legislation, no hearings were held on the bill in the House, and only those who were in favor of the economy bill took part in the drafting of the measure.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield for a correction of one statement?

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman can do that in his own time, or, if I get additional time, I shall be glad to yield.

I want to say to the Members of the House in connection with the pending bill the Secretary of Agriculture, the economists of the Agriculture Department, Mr. Morganthau, the Farm Administrator, who is an enthusiastic advocate of agricultural-relief legislation, and the Committees on Agriculture of the House and Senate were all called in and were given an opportunity to make suggestions and to help formulate the policy contained in this bill. Hearings were held by the Committee on Agriculture of the House to give those who represent the administration as well as others an opportunity to make suggestions and to offer amendments. Then the bill was brought in here with ample time for the Members to consider the legislation, with plenty of time to discuss it, and an opportunity given the committee to offer committee amendments when the bill is taken up under the 5-minute rule. I would have less objection to the economy bill if similar consideration had been given the Members of the House. If that bill, for example, which affects our war veterans had been referred to our Veterans' Committee and approved by them, I could not object, as I did. If that section of the bill that destroyed many helpful improvements in the working conditions of our postal employees had been considered by our Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, or if our committee had even been given an opportunity to make suggestions, I would not have made the objections which I did to that bill.

In my judgment the economy bill was considered in a very inappropriate way. Little or no consideration was given to the general Membership of the House, and if that method or practice was continued I would not support this measure. I would object strenuously to the adoption of such rules as would hinder Members from being given an opportunity to express their views. But in this case I can say, and I am sure you will agree, this bill has received reasonable consideration. It has been brought to us by the friends of agriculture, and I hope the men who come from city districts will support this measure and every other helpful form of legislation for the relief of agriculture. [Applause.]

THE RELATION BETWEEN AGRICULTURE AND INDUSTRY

With more than 25 million people, over 20 percent of our population, living on the Nation's farms, we must realize the effect their economic condition is bound to have on the economic condition of the country as a whole.

When agriculture is impoverished as it is at present, there can be no lasting prosperity in the cities, and the wage-earner must suffer along with the farmer. The purchasing power of our farmers is one of the most necessary factors influencing our general economic trend, and it is vital that this purchasing power be restored to its former higher level. In this present depression the farm population has been most seriously affected. They have suffered severe losses in cash income as a result of the violent drop in commodity prices.

The farmer comparatively pays more for the goods he buys than he receives for the products he sells. At the same time his interest, taxes, and other fixed charges remain at their former high levels. This bill which we are now considering offers some relief insofar as these fixed charges are concerned. The cash income of the farmer has declined seriously since 1929 when it amounted to $10,134,000,000. For the year 1931 this income amounts to $5,400,000,000. The loss of so staggering a sum in the purchasing power of our farm population has been felt by nearly every industry in the country.

In any scheme for the revival of general prosperity agriculture must go hand in hand with commerce and industry. We cannot consider one to the neglect of the other. The broad, comprehensive, forward-looking plans outlined and sponsored by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, embracing as they do every major activity in the economic life of the Republic, will, in my judgment, contribute mightily toward a restoration of prosperity that will include commerce, industry, and agriculture.

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, just to keep the record straight, I want to make a correction in the statement just made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] pertaining to the consideration of the economy bill.

In the first place, if there was anything wrong with the rule on the economy bill, I will say to the gentleman that the rule was obtained from a Democratic Rules Committee by the Democratic membership of the Economy Committee.

When it came to allowing time, the gentleman from New York said no time was given to the opposition. Of the time which was delegated to the Republican side, there was time given to the opposition. Opposition time was given to the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. WITHROW, to the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. BOILEAU, the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. LUNDEEN—not a member of the Republican Party, but a member of the Farmer-Labor Party, but who was given his time by the Republican Membership—the gentleman from North Dakota, Mr. LEMKE, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. PATMAN, a Democrat, received a part of his time in opposition to the economy bill from the Republican side.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. I should like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that on Friday, March 10, which was the second day of Congress and the day before that bill came up in the House, the Senate Finance Committee had a hearing on that bill and the members of the Economy Committee, including the gentleman from Kansas, attended that hearing?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. And the hearings were printed and distributed to the Senators on Saturday morning before the bill was taken up in the House, in which it was shown by Mr. Douglas, the Director of the Budget, and by General Hines, exactly how these cuts were going to be made, and we were told that there had been no hearings, and that no copies of hearings were available and——

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield the gentleman 1 additional minute?

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Kansas 1 additional minute.

Mr. PATMAN. We were told there had been no hearings. Copies of the hearings were available to the Economy Committee members on Saturday morning, March 11. They were marked "Executive session—Confidential." These hearings disclosed that what has recently been done in the way of eliminating and reducing veterans' benefits was contemplated at the time of the bill's introduction into the House. Many Members would not have voted for that bill if they had seen the hearings. These printed hearings, which we did not know about for days after the passage of the act, disclosed that $200,000,000 would be taken from service-connected cases annually and also other discriminatory provisions.

Mr. McGUGIN. I am not aware who said there had been no hearings. I am quite certain I never said there had been no hearings, because there was a joint hearing of the Senate Finance Committee and the House Economy Committee, at which the bill was discussed for at least 2 hours.

As to what was stated before that committee about what would be the reductions, I may state there was no such proposition about what the reductions would be. There was a statement as to what they could be if the President chose to make them. It was made clear at all times that the reductions were to be made later by the President. No one undertook to speak for the President in advance as to what would be his regulations.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THURSTON].

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, much has been said here today and in the preceding days of this session concerning the plight of the farmer. So I take it that we are either informed or agreed as to his plight or condition.

Therefore I want to direct my remarks to just one phase of this pending bill, and that relates to the interest rate.

The bill before us provides that the farmer shall pay 4½ percent interest. The older Members of the Chamber know that they enacted legislation to assist the shipping interests of this country by granting access to the Federal Treasury, and this industry was allowed to obtain funds at a rate of interest varying from 4½ percent down, possibly, to three eighths of 1 percent.

I shall ask unanimous consent to insert as a part of my remarks a statement received this date from the United States Shipping Board setting out a table of loans made to the respective shipping concerns and the rates of interest that these organizations pay.

The coastwise shipping-trade interests pay 4½ percent for money they obtain, but when we come to the ships in the foreign trade we find the rate of interest is as follows: 2⅞, 2⅜, 3½, 3, 2⅞, 2⅝, 2¾.

Some of the money has been used to construct tank ships to haul petroleum or crude oil from Central and South America to compete with our own oil fields and our own railroads.

We have loaned Federal money to ship trains so that they can load merchandise in cars in New York City and take it by sea to Habana, in competition with our railway system.

When you make a survey of the generosity of the Government to these organizations, surely no one will deny that the farmers of this country, the agricultural interests, are entitled to comparable rates.

So I hope that when the proper time comes we may have an opportunity to amend and reduce the rate of interest that is to be charged the farmer under the terms of this bill from 4½ percent to 3½ percent.

Now, not only do these great shipping interests have this cheap rate of interest but they receive substantial subsidies for every trip they make from America to foreign ports, and in the aggregate they receive very favorable terms from the Federal Treasury.

It was not my purpose to enter into a discussion of the general purposes of this bill, but simply to emphasize the fact that if we can obtain a rate of 3½ or possibly as low as 3 percent for the shipping interests of the country we should for this most essential of all industries, the agricultural industry, provide equal or like treatment.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THURSTON. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Were these loans made by this administration or during a former administration?

Mr. THURSTON. They were made in the past and are currently being made to ships in the course of construction.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks a table that I received from the Shipping Board, giving precise information concerning loans made to shipping interests.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection, and the tables are as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, April 11, 1933.

Hon. LLOYD THURSTON,
Room 248, House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with your telephone request, I transmit herewith the following enclosures:

(1) Copy of Report B.R. No. 1105 showing all loans made from construction loan fund from inception to February 28, 1933.

(2) Copy of list showing actual amount of interest paid on each loan to December 31, 1932, and the effective rate of such interest.

(3) Copy of rules for determining the amount of interest payable on construction loans.

Under column headed "Name of vessel" in enclosure (1), I have inserted the foreign trade interest rate for each loan. The coastwise trade interest rate is 5¼ percent on all loans.

An examination of the rules set forth in enclosure (3), particularly of rule V, will reveal the methods used in determining the amounts of interest payable on the various loans as reflected in enclosure (2).

Should you desire additional information, please advise me.

Very truly yours,

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND FINANCE,
J. W. BARNETT, Director.

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ARENS].

Mr. ARENS. Mr. Chairman, I am taking the floor today to remind the Members of Congress of the promise given to the voters in the farming section, the promise of giving justice and equality to agriculture. It was this promise given to the farmers in the last campaign that brought about this enormous Democratic majority.

Equality in tariff and equality with other industries in extending help in refinancing agriculture by giving them loans on long terms at the same interest rates that other industries are receiving from the Government.

In 1928 the Republicans at their convention in Kansas City promised the farmer a fair and just tariff. On the strength of this promise the people elected a Republican Congress with a majority of over 100 Members. They did not keep their promise. The Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was a direct lie to agriculture. It destroyed the market for the surplus and because of their not keeping their promise this same agricultural section helped elect an overwhelming Democratic Congress.

Are you Democratic Members not going to learn by this sad experience of the Republican Party? I am going to say to you Democrats that the voters of the country are going to learn. They are going to learn that it is very unwise to give a large majority to any of the old parties. The Smoot-Hawley bill was forced through Congress by a rule that limited debate and limited amendment to those proposed by the Ways and Means Committee. The Democratic minority at that time emphatically objected to this gag rule. Today the Democratic majority brings in the same rule and the Republican minority takes the arguments used in 1928 by the then Democratic minority against this gag rule and throws it back at them. The voters will learn that their interests are served best if they send to this Congress a large block of safe and sane Farmer-Laborites that will hold the balance of power and see to it that the old parties both are going to keep their promises.

The bill before us is not giving equality to agriculture. It fixes the interest rate at 4½ percent without amortization, and by the time appraisal fees and recording fees and amortization are added it will cost the farmer close to 6 percent, which is 2, 3, 4, yes, 5 times higher than the interest paid to the same Government by other industries or foreign governments. The present price of agricultural products does not enable the farmer to meet these payments.

I was a member of the Minnesota Senate in 1923, when they passed the rural credit bureau bill. It provided an interest rate of 5¼ percent plus 1 percent for amortization. This was considered a low rate, according to conditions, much lower than the rate proposed in this bill. However, the farmers of Minnesota have not been able to keep up the payments on the loans under this bill. The report of the chairman of the Rural Credit Board of Minnesota shows that out of 13,434 loans made 3,190 have been foreclosed and are now in the possession of the State, 6,129 are delinquent in their taxes and interest, and only 4,115 farm loans are in good standing. The bill also provides the issuance of $2,000,000,000 of tax-exempt bonds. Taxes that should be paid by the holders of the $2,000,000,000 in wealth will have to be paid by those least able to pay. The bill should be financed by the Federal Reserve bank by issuing Treasury notes with farm mortgages as security, the same as is provided in the so-called "Frazier bill."

I am finding a lot of fault with the measure before the House. However, it has some merit. It will reduce the interest rate in Minnesota by about one half of 1 percent, and I am informed considerably more in some other States. It will establish one place where the farmer can get credit. He can receive credit after all other sources have been eliminated. It will start a way to refinance the farmer. Its mistakes will show up soon, and we may be in a position to correct them at our next regular session. I am going, therefore, to vote for the bill, because I do not deny even these small crumbs that this bill is offering in order to enable those farmers who are able to continue operating to wait for better times.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENS. Yes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Did the people of this country turn to the Democratic Party in expectation of any tariff relief?

Mr. ARENS. They did expect that President Roosevelt would bring about a relief in tariff, as he indicated. They did expect that the Democratic Party would give the farmers relief in refinancing their mortgages.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENS. Yes.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I remind the gentleman that the Labor Party in the British Empire started with only one member, and that party today is in control of the Government and has had the Premier three different times.

Mr. ARENS. I am finding fault with the bill. It has some merits. It enables the farmers of Minnesota, if they choose, to come in under it to save one quarter to one half of 1 percent interest. I am told by Members from other States that it will save more to them, the interest rate in their States being higher. The interest rate in Minnesota was reduced considerably as soon as the State went to loaning money, and I am told by Members from some other States that it will save from 1½ to 2 percent to their farmers. Besides that, it creates a place where the farmer can receive credit after all other sources have been eliminated. There is no more credit for the farmer anywhere. This law will create at least one place where the farmer can refinance his loans.

What are we going to do? A good many will ask how we are going to vote. I am going to vote to recommit the bill. I am for the Frazier bill. I shall do all I can honorably to have this bill go back to the committee and have the Frazier bill substituted for it. I believe the method of financing in the Frazier bill is better than to issue another

$2,000,000,000 of tax-exempt securities. I probably will have to vote for the bill if we do not succeed in substituting the Frazier bill. I could not very well face the people and say that I would deny even those crumbs that are falling in this bill from the table of the Government. It may be the instrument of keeping a few of them alive until after this experiment, when we can amend the bill at the next regular session and make a real bill out of it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from Kansas [Mrs. McCARTHY].

Mrs. McCARTHY. Mr. Chairman, you would not expect any woman to be for any gag rule, much less one who has kissed the Blarney stone. So I am proud of the fact I voted against this rule. [Applause.]

Regardless of that fact, I would be against any rule which would prevent an amendment in the interest of the farmers. I feel that this bill is in need of many amendments, and I am going to tell you some of the things that are wrong with it. The thing most radically wrong is the rate of interest. In my district, representing 26 agricultural counties, one fourth of the State of Kansas, there is not a farm that has shown a profit of 5 percent. Under this bill, direct loans pay 5 percent interest.

If the loan is made through a Federal loaning agency, they pay 4½ percent. There is not a farm in my district that makes 4½ percent profit. How is this bill going to do any good to those farmers?

I am for the Frazier bill whole-heartedly, because of the 1½ percent interest rate and the amortization rate of 1½ percent. I will vote to recommit this bill; but I will say that if that motion to recommit and substitute the Frazier bill is defeated, I will be for the administration bill rather than to have nothing. I will tell you why I vote that way. There is a provision in this bill that 5 years is given for the payment of principal. In other words, it would give the farmer 5 more years with a roof over his head. So, even if he will lose his farm eventually, there is some merit in the bill. For that reason I will vote for it. But why take a poor compromise when we could get something that would really benefit our farmers? We have had people come here and say, "I do not have a farmer in my district, but I am for this bill." They are for this bill with a high interest rate, but they have not made any study of it and they do not know farm conditions. A year ago last fall we had the national corn-husking contest in my district. We grow a great deal of corn in that district. The State of Kansas not only grows the best wheat in the world but, according to the latest report of the Department of Agriculture, mills more flour than any other State in the Union and now passes Minnesota by some 7,000,000 bushels annually. Certainly I am entitled to speak for the farmers of Kansas and to register their protest against this excessively high interest rate.

Another serious objection to this bill is the fact that the profit goes to the bankers. We have had too much catering to international bankers and to special privilege. [Applause.] The very fact that we need this bill today is due to too much legislation in the interest of special industry. If we had not had the high protective-tariff rates which compelled the farmer to buy everything he used in a protected market and to sell everything he produced in a world market, he would not be in the condition he is today.

The fact has been repeatedly stated that one of the serious ills of the country is the maldistribution of wealth. The sentiment of this House is undoubtedly now for currency expansion and inflation. The Wheeler bill has been mentioned. Why do we need that? Because it would help bring about a redistribution of wealth. That is one reason I am for the Frazier bill, because of the provision for currency expansion that would put some of our money out in the agricultural districts where it belongs and take it away from Wall Street.

We will not consider a single measure during this session which is more important than that pending at this time, yet there is really only a handful of Members present. I wonder if some of their constituents will not say: "After the next election they will have plenty of time to go to ball games when they will not be receiving money from the Federal pay roll"?

There is just one thing more I want to take up, and that is the useless red tape heretofore required in order to get a Federal loan, and this plan for refinancing farm mortgages contains a provision for direct loans without going through several intermediaries. [Applause].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CARPENTER].

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, coming from a strictly agricultural district, as I do, I feel it is my duty to urge upon this Congress the adoption of what is known as the Frazier bill. I am glad that, being one of the new Democratic Members of this House from Kansas, along with my lady colleague, who has just addressed you, I am in accord with her on this matter as representing the farmers. And I believe all the rest of our colleagues in Kansas are also in accord. I am glad we are all here on the job this afternoon instead of going to the ball game.

Now, I favor the Frazier bill for the reason that it gives us a lower rate of interest; but primarily I am in favor of it because I think the greatest emergency legislation we could consider we have not had an opportunity to consider, and that is the expansion of the currency. To my mind that is the only way I can conceive of bringing back prosperity to this country in the near future. Not having an opportunity to get the Frazier bill, if we cannot get that, I say that next I am in favor of the present bill and will vote for it when the time comes. First, if we have an opportunity to vote to recommit the present bill, with instructions to the Agriculture Committee to amend by substituting the Frazier bill, I will vote to recommit it accordingly. If we have no such opportunity, or such a motion to recommit fails, then I will vote for the present bill, as I said, on the theory it is the only available mortgage relief. And, so far as I am concerned, do everything I can to make it a success.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER] called my attention to a bill which he had introduced, which in some respects may be better than the Frazier bill. I do not know. The gentleman stated it was before the Ways and Means Committee. I said, "Why do you not present it as an amendment before the Committee on Agriculture?" The gentleman said, "That committee would rule it out under the rule."

Yesterday when my colleague, Mr. McGUGIN, was speaking, trying to explain to the farmers the rules of the House and why we could not consider the Frazier bill, I asked him, "Do you think our farmers give a snap of their fingers for the rules of the House?" I wish to say that when there are such important matters as the Frazier bill pending and we are told that the rules of the House prevent our considering it, the farmers of Kansas and the farmers of the Nation do not give a damn for the rules of this House. [Applause.]

This is not all. They read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. They know what is going on. They know that when the reforestation bill was up before this House and ran into a snag that was about to prevent further consideration of it that it was saved by a special rule brought in by the Committee on Rules. They know that whenever the powers that be want to do something they can get a rule to do it. Now, we can find a rule, if necessary, to consider this Frazier bill, because it is of the utmost importance.

Let me call attention to an Associated Press dispatch which appeared in the Washington Star of last Friday, to the effect that the United States currency is now backed by 73 percent in metal security. I read:

A circulating currency that is backed by a 73-percent gold base is the answer Uncle Sam can give to any charges that this country has embarked on a program of issuing unsound money.

We hear much talk about expansion, but we are right on the verge of expanding the bond issues of the country. Is there objection? Of course there ought to be considerable objection to an expansion of the bond issues of the country. I prefer an expansion of the currency instead of an expansion of the bonded indebtedness of the country.

Let me call your attention further to this Associated Press dispatch:

> Only $15,930,000 of the new Federal Reserve bank notes, constituting the much discussed new money was in actual circulation. Thus far only 5 of the 12 regional banks have availed themselves of the new currency, which is backed by sound assets.

There is now $1,277,000,000 less money in circulation than there was during the bank crisis in this country early in March.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I have listened most of the day to the presentation of this great question. Let me say to those who have spoken here, particularly to the Members from the West, that they have done it with great earnestness and ability. Had they been here with this same interest and ability when the Federal Reserve Act was passed, it would have amounted to something instead of being mostly all a lemon. I admire them for laying aside partisanship with a resolution to evolve out of this bill something worth while.

A moment ago the statement was made that many Members speaking from the well said that while they did not represent an agricultural district they were interested in the bill. It so happens that I do represent an agricultural district, one of eight counties in the heart of Pennsylvania. I knew the fathers of some of the younger Members from the Far West and can tell these Members where they came from. Among them is my good friend, MCCLINTIC, from Oklahoma. He came from one of the most fertile, luxuriant, hospitable, and prosperous valleys in all the world, with a name as long as its fame, Kishacoquillas Valley, Pa., where he returns to hunt in the mountains, where they make better schweitzer cheese than they make in Switzerland, Germany, Minnesota, or Wisconsin, from Belleville, Pa., where Brother MCCLINTIC was born.

I represent eight counties, I said, and a hundred fertile valleys that have been cultivated for more than 200 years; and I may say, Mr. Chairman, these farmers are just as eagerly and as anxiously watching the outcome of this measure as you of the West are. Your vote here for your farmers are votes for my farmers; and we ought to have brains enough to write a bill which will bring about some of the results so badly needed. It is a fact that we have been 10, 12, 14 years struggling along trying to get something to help the farmer.

I admit that many times we have tried to lift ourselves by our bootstraps; that we got away from the common sense of our fathers who understood the practical way of doing things; and right now I thank God that they wrote into the Constitution and our laws the checks, balances, and hindrances that make it impossible to railroad these bills through so speedily. We have seen bills introduced on the hurry-up order to be passed today and be operative next week, but they did not get through the Senate so suddenly, and they are not through the Senate yet.

Our Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. John McSparren, Pennsylvania, has advised me that he is for the bill, while the Rural New Yorker is opposed to it. Thus we have a divergence of opinion; but that should not deter support of something.

I hope and trust that when we get through with this program we will have something that will be of real benefit to the farmers.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether a little thought I have here, if practically applied with all the energy expended in this great debate, might not be of value.

Here is a farm 5 minutes' distance from my residence in Lewisburg. Five minutes from the time they have their milk at this farmhouse it could be on my table in Lewisburg. At the farm they pay 2 cents a quart for it. In my home I pay 10 cents a quart for it. What has happened while it is being transferred from this farm to my home that has caused this difference in price?

This is the question, Mr. Chairman, underlying this whole matter of agriculture—marketing. The people in the farmhouse do not get the price we pay for their products nor anything like it. Let us have courage enough to tackle this phase of the problem.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I presume the gentleman will vote for this bill.

Mr. FOCHT. Certainly I will vote for the bill and will try to support the President throughout, although I could not register for him on the beer saloon, nor against the soldier, nor will I approve any tariff tinkering. All my life I have been trying to get something done here, and you are doing just exactly what I want done, but there must be cooperation to the end that the right thing may be accomplished. I will vote for any little scrap of thing that will start us in the right direction and trust to the intelligent administration of the law by the people that the ultimate result will mean something for the farmer.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the plight of the farmer as identical throughout all sections of the Nation, in every State of the Union and in every division and branch of the industry, and I would take a few moments to discuss a particular division of this great business that the State of Wisconsin, which I have the privilege of serving, is particularly interested in and identified with.

Wisconsin, with its neighbor States of Minnesota, Iowa, Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, Indiana, and the great State of New York, leads in the dairy industry. It represents 20 percent of the total income of the American farmer. It calls upon a greater degree of investment in buildings and equipment and scientific management than any other branch of agriculture. In the State of Wisconsin we have maintained over the past 5 years a production in volume of about 11,000,000,000 pounds. In the peak year of 1929 this was valued at $236,000,000. In the year of 1932 the shrinkage that occurred was a matter of $104,000,000. This represents over 55 percent, and in the course of the past 4 or 5 years the farmers of Wisconsin have become encumbered with mortgages that total $750,000,000.

We recognize the need for aid and action now, and I personally want to state my opinion that the President of the United States is fully aware of the need of American agriculture and that the decision he has arrived at has come by seasoned knowledge and understanding and conference, seeking counsel with the best groups in the Nation. I have faith and confidence that the President of the United States is proposing this legislation because he knows it will register immediate aid to the American farmer.

I do not believe that this measure is a cure-all. I feel there are things that are left undone, but it is a step in the right direction, and after months, and, yes, years of delay, it is refreshing to have a leadership with the vision to see and the courage to act, and in supporting this legislation I believe we are supporting the program of President Roosevelt, who has captured the admiration and the respect of the American people; and they are more interested in the desires and plans of Roosevelt than the personal opinion of Congressmen. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ARNOLD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 4795, had come to no resolution thereon.

THE "AKRON" DISASTER

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
United States of America, Washington, D.C.:

The House of Representatives, in session on this date, resolved to express to the American people through their worthy Representatives our sincere sympathy in the deplorable catastrophe of the dirigible Akron.

513. Also, petition signed by numerous residents of Ghent, Minn., requesting legislation providing that all petroleum products used in internal-combustion engines shall be blended, 10 percent by volume, with ethyl alcohol made from agricultural products grown in the continental United States; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

514. Also, petition of residents of the township of Mamre, Kandiyohi County, Minn., urging passage of the Frazier bill, providing for the refinancing of farm mortgages; to the Committee on Agriculture.

515. Also, petition of the Watonwan County (Minn.) Holiday Association, urging passage of the Frazier bill, providing for the refinancing of farm mortgages; to the Committee on Agriculture.

516. By Mr. REID of Illinois: Resolution of the Laverne T. Perrottet Post, No. 76, American Legion, Wheaton, Ill., protesting against the official recognition by the United States of America of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

517. By Mr. RUDD: Petition of the Jacobs Bros. Co., Inc., Brooklyn, N.Y., opposing the passage of the Black bill, S. 158, providing for a 30-hour week; to the Committee on Labor.

518. By Mr. SMITH of West Virginia: Resolution of the Beckley Chamber of Commerce, Beckley, W.Va., favoring legislation providing that the first-class postage rate be returned to 2 cents; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE

THURSDAY, APRIL 13, 1933

(Legislative day of Tuesday, Apr. 11, 1933)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	Kean	Reed
Ashurst	Costigan	Kendrick	Reynolds
Austin	Couzens	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.
Bachman	Cutting	La Follette	Robinson, Ind.
Bailey	Dickinson	Lewis	Russell

Caraway	Hastings	Nye	Wagner
Carey	Hatfield	Overton	Walcott
Clark	Hayden	Patterson	Walsh
Connally	Hebert	Pittman	Wheeler
Coolidge	Johnson	Pope	White

Mr. REED. I desire to announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] is still necessarily absent because of illness. I ask that the announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] because of a death in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The Senate will receive a message from the President of the United States.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

FUNCTIONS OF THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE (S.DOC. NO. 25)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Attorney General, transmitting, in response to Senate Resolution 351, Seventy-second Congress, a report of all functions executed by the Department of Justice, together with reference to the statutory authorities for the execution of said functions and the annual cost thereof, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

FUNCTIONS OF THE DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY (S.DOC. NO. 24)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in response to Senate Resolution 351, Seventy-second Congress, a report of all the functions and the personnel of the Navy Department, together with the annual cost thereof, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

FUNCTIONS OF THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION (S.DOC. NO. 23)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, transmitting, in response to Senate Resolution 351, Seventy-second Congress, a report of the functions and activities conducted under the jurisdiction of the Veterans' Administration, the statutory authority therefor, and the total amounts appropriated for the fiscal year 1933, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PROTECTION OF SMALL-HOME OWNERS FROM FORECLOSURE (H.DOC. NO. 19)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Congress:

As a further and urgently necessary step in the program to promote economic recovery, I ask the Congress for legislation to protect small-home owners from foreclosure and to relieve them of a portion of the burden of excessive interest and principal payments incurred during the period of higher values and higher earning power.

Implicit in the legislation which I am suggesting to you is a declaration of national policy. This policy is that the broad interests of the Nation require that special safeguards should be thrown around home ownership as a guaranty of social and economic stability, and that to protect home owners from inequitable enforced liquidation, in a time of general distress, is a proper concern of the Government.

The legislation I propose follows the general lines of the farm mortgage refinancing bill. The terms are such as to impose the least possible charge upon the National Treasury consistent with the objects sought. It provides machinery through which existing mortgage debts on small homes may be adjusted to a sound basis of values without injustice to investors, at substantially lower interest rates and with provision for postponing both interest and principal payments in cases of extreme need. The resources to be made available through a bond issue to be guaranteed as to interest only by the Treasury will, it is thought, be sufficient to meet the needs of those to whom other methods of financing are not available. At the same time the plan of settlement will provide a standard which should put an end to present uncertain and chaotic conditions that create fear and despair among both home owners and investors.

Legislation of this character is a subject that demands our most earnest, thoughtful, and prompt consideration.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 13, 1933.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask leave to introduce a bill to be known as "the Home Owners Loan Act", and I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be received and so referred.

The bill (S. 1317) to provide emergency relief with respect to home-mortgage indebtedness, to refinance home mortgages, to extend relief to the owners of homes occupied by them and who are unable to amortize their debt elsewhere, to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, to increase the market for obligations of the United States, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

CHANGE IN DATE OF THE INAUGURATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, ratifying the twentieth amendment of the Constitution, fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of the Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress, which was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

STATE OF TENNESSEE,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, Ernest N. Haston, secretary of state of the State of Tennessee, do hereby certify that the annexed is a true copy of Senate Joint Resolution No. 31, acts of 1933, the original of which is now on file and a matter of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my official signature and by order of the Governor affixed the great seal of the State of Tennessee at the department in the city of Nashville this 31st day of March A.D. 1933.

[SEAL] ERNEST N. HASTON,
Secretary of State.

Senate Joint Resolution 13 (Shelby delegation), relating to the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress

Whereas at the first session of the Seventy-second Congress of the United States of America it was—

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled (two thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three fourths of the several States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution, viz:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3d day of January unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

"SEC. 3. If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President-elect shall have died, the Vice President-elect shall become President. If a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President-elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice President-elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President-elect nor a Vice President-elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President or the manner in which one who is to act shall be elected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President shall have qualified.

"SEC. 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice may have devolved upon them.

"SEC. 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article.

"SEC. 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three fourths of the several States within 7 years from the date of its submission":

Therefore be it—

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That said proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America be, and the same is, hereby ratified by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee; be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of the foregoing preamble and joint resolution be forwarded by the Governor of the State of Tennessee to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of State of the United States at Washington, D.C., to the President of the Senate of the United States, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Adopted January 20, 1933.

A. F. OFFICER,
Speaker of the Senate.
FRANK W. MOORE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved January 20, 1933.

HILL MCALISTER, Governor.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Thirty-seventh State Conference of the Daughters of the American Revolution of Illinois, protesting against the recognition of the Soviet Government of Russia under present conditions, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram and a letter from John M. Parker, of New Orleans, La., together with two petitions of citizens of the State of Louisiana, relating to alleged acts and conduct of Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram from the president of the New Orleans (La.) Board of Trade, Ltd., embodying a resolution adopted by the board of directors of that board, endorsing the policies of the administration of President Roosevelt dealing with the reopening of the banks on a sound basis, the unemployment-relief program, and efforts for the reestablishment of confidence, etc., which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from D. J. Melvin, of Titusville, Fla., praying for the passage of legislation to authorize the establishment of a Federal relief commission or administration, headed by the President of the United States, to supersede the relief work of the American Red Cross, etc., and also praying for the establishment of an old-age pension system, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by a meeting of citizens of Williamsburgh, Brooklyn, N.Y., protesting against alleged persecution of the Jews in Germany, and favoring the passage of legislation permitting entry into the United States of such persons of Jewish faith, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolution adopted by the Brooklyn Civic Club and the Thirteenth Assembly District Regular Democratic Organization, both of Brooklyn, and the Edgemere Democratic Club, of Edgemere, all in the State of New York, protesting against the persecution of and alleged outrages committed against the Jews in Germany, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Twin Ports Lodge, No. 12, International Shipmasters' Association of the Great Lakes, Kenmore, N.Y., protesting against the proposed transfer of the Hydrographic Office from the Navy Department to the Bureau of Coast and Geodetic Survey, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Howard Beach Association, Inc., in the State of New York, favoring the repeal of wage-cut provisions of the so-called "Economy Act", which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions of the Maritime Association of the Port of New York, and the Propeller Club of the United States, both of New York City, N.Y., protesting against the ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WHEELER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Comstock and vicinity, Custer County, Nebr., praying for the passage of Senate bill 70, known as the "Wheeler bill", providing for the remonetization of silver, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHEELER presented a resolution adopted by Local Union No. 197, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, of Sherman, Tex., which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas members of Carpenters' Local Union No. 197, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, believe, after undergoing 4 years of unemployment and distress, that it is time relief measures of some kind be passed by our Government, and sincerely believe that the views of Senator B. K. WHEELER are very sound, indeed: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Local Union No. 197 of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Sherman, Tex., endorse the Wheeler bill, S. 70, and very respectfully request Congress to enact same as soon as possible.

LOCAL UNION No. 197,
Sherman, Tex.

CHECKING OF EROSION ON THE NEW JERSEY COAST

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the printing in the RECORD of a resolution I have received from the Board of Chosen Freeholders, County of Atlantic, N.J., urging that some of the funds to be spent for unemployment relief be spent in arresting the serious shore erosion along the New Jersey coast, and ask that it be appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Federal Government is about to spend considerable money in reclaiming and protecting areas of the United States that demand such attention, which activity will relieve present unemployment to a considerable extent; and

Whereas the continual and destructive erosion of the shore line of New Jersey has always received attention of the affected municipalities up to the present time, when the condition of municipal finances has made it impossible for this necessary protective work to be further continued; and

Whereas there is no available source, other than Federal Government, for assistance in taking care of this situation, which is already developing deplorable results: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the attention of the Federal Government be called to this situation and a petition for relief be and is hereby respectfully submitted to that agency of the Federal Government upon which responsibility is placed in the accomplishment of the purpose of the Federal Government above referred to; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be submitted, by the clerk of this board, to Senators KEAN and BARBOUR and to Representative BACHARACH for their use in presenting this petition for relief and urging, upon the proper department of the Federal Government, a prompt investigation of the aforesaid need of Federal Government aid in coast protection.

Certified as a true copy of a resolution adopted by the Board of Chosen Freeholders, Atlantic County, N.J., on April 12, 1933.

F. W. WILLETT, Clerk.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, also I ask unanimous consent for the printing in the RECORD of a resolution I have received from the Chamber of Commerce of Brigantine, N.J., urging legislation for the protection of beach-front property from erosion by storms, and ask that it be appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRIGANTINE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Brigantine, N.J., April 11, 1933.

Hon. W. WARREN BARBOUR,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SIR: The Brigantine Chamber of Commerce has ordered that I forward to you the following resolution passed by the chamber Tuesday, April 10, 1933:

"Whereas the recent severe storms on the Atlantic Ocean have done considerable damage to the beach-front property in the city of Brigantine; and

"Whereas such damage caused a great loss in assessable property and is jeopardizing the city water and sewer system; and

"Whereas there has been considerable discussion concerning the proposed passage of a statute authorizing, as a means of unemployment relief, the protection of ocean-front property: Now, therefore,

"The Brigantine Chamber of Commerce does resolve, That the secretary be, and he hereby is, authorized and instructed to communicate with Senator W. WARREN BARBOUR and advise him concerning the critical condition of the beach-front property in the city of Brigantine and the immediate need for some beach protection, to the end that if some legislation is passed authorizing this type of work, the city of Brigantine be considered as applying for some such relief."

Respectfully submitted.

L. M. LINDSEY, Secretary.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent for the printing in the RECORD of a resolution I have received from the Board of Chosen Freeholders of the County of Ocean, N.J., urging that some of the funds spent for unemployment relief be spent in arresting the very serious shore erosion along the New Jersey coast, and ask that it be appropriately referred:

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution, April 12, 1933 (by Mr. Applegate)

Whereas it is understood that the United States Government is about to spend considerable amounts of money for reforestation and reclamation plans, particularly for the relieving of the unemployment situation; and

Whereas a continual and serious erosion of the shore line of New Jersey has created a condition that threatens the very existence of the seashore resorts if this erosion is not checked; and

Whereas the conditions have become so serious and the cost of measures needed to check this erosion and protect this shore line is so great that in the present financial conditions the various municipalities are unable to furnish sufficient funds for the prosecution of such work: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the attention of President Roosevelt be called to this condition and that he be, and hereby is, petitioned to give careful consideration to this condition and direct the expenditure of a portion of the unemployment-relief funds to the purposes above mentioned, and that copies of this resolution be sent to our Congressman and two United States Senators.

I, James K. Allardice, clerk of the Board of Chosen Freeholders of the County of Ocean, hereby certify that the above is a true copy of a resolution adopted by the said board on the 12th day of April 1933.

[SEAL] JAMES K. ALLARDICE, Clerk.

EUGENE MEYER

Mr. REED. Mr. President, out of order and by unanimous consent, I should like to offer an article for publication in the RECORD. During recent days very much bitter criticism has been expressed of Mr. Eugene Meyer by certain Senators in this body, and I think that it is only justice to Mr. Meyer and a fair recognition of the conspicuous public service he has rendered in the administrations of President Wilson, President Coolidge, and President Hoover that the article by Mr. Frank R. Kent appearing in this morning's Baltimore Sun should be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. So I ask unanimous consent that the article may be printed at this point and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, Apr. 13, 1933]

THE GREAT GAME OF POLITICS

By Frank R. Kent

HE SAID IT IN 1923

WASHINGTON, April 12.—It is a pity our politics are of such a kind that a new President cannot, without unpleasant political complications, retain the services of conspicuously fit men of the other party whom he finds in office. It would greatly promote the efficient working of our governmental machine if he could.

For example, not many aside from the professional denunciators of the rich, like the Brookharts and Longs, will fail to feel that the retirement of Mr. Eugene Meyer as head of the Federal Reserve Board is a loss to the country, and really to the administration. It is possible, of course, to find a Democrat who in character and ability measures up to this job, though the list in either party is a limited one. It is hardly possible, however, to find one with the training, experience, and detailed knowledge of the system possessed by Mr. Meyer. That is where the loss comes in.

With the passing of Mr. Meyer from public life it is timely to recall the outstanding features of his public career, which have become blurred by the passage of the years to people generally, but not to those posted on Federal financial history. Few men have had more to do with its making the last 15 years. There is space here only to recount them briefly. In 1918 he was named by Woodrow Wilson as a member of the great War Finance Board, and in 6 months became its dominant head, staying until its final liquidation. In 1927 Mr. Coolidge called on him to reorganize the Federal farm loan system, the affairs of which had gotten into bad shape.

Mr. Hoover made him the head of the Federal Reserve Board, and as such he became the first chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The operating machine of this great governmental agency was set up by Mr. Meyer. Most of its key men were with him in the War Finance Board, and the chief reason the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was able to function as quickly and well as it has—because despite the attacks upon it, it has done both—was because of Mr. Meyer's experience in the War Finance Board and his ability to get the men trained in that work to come to Washington in subordinate positions for an emergency job laid down along similar lines.

Aside from these things, which it will be conceded equip a man with an uncommon experience in Federal finance, it is interesting, in the light of what has happened to the banks of the Nation, to recall Mr. Meyer's views on banks and bankers. As far back as 1923 he gave them before a Senate committee. At that time he strongly advocated a unified banking system under Federal supervision and with Federal inspection. He pictured to the committee exactly what the flood of State legislation on banking lines was doing, pointed out the danger to depositors, caustically commented upon the practices which competition between State banks and National banks, trust companies and saving banks, commercial banks and savings banks, was compelling bankers of all kinds to do. He graphically summed the whole banking situation up at that time by calling it a "competition in laxity."

It could hardly have been better described. The competition among the banks to get deposits was like the competition among some States to get corporations to locate in them. All sorts of inducements were offered—exemptions from taxes, subsidies in one form or another, the keys to the city. Banks have proceeded along the same lines—higher interest rates than their rivals, more conveniences, bigger buildings, greater facilities, etc. It has been a race, and to a lot of banks—and much more important, a lot of depositors—a ruinous one. It compelled banks to assume too many functions, to go into side lines, to become too "progressive."

It is worth noting that 10 years ago Mr. Meyer saw this and in plain words, which are a matter of record, told the Senate about it. Further, Mr. Meyer was opposed from the start to the "affiliates" which so many large banks organized to sell securities in the boom years, and expressed his belief to various banking heads that the practice was not only unsound but indefensible. Fundamentally, the Meyer idea about banks is that they are not purely private institutions but are semipublic, and that presidents of banks should recognize this as basic in their business.

The opportunity, the incentive, and the desire to make large profits should be taken away from banks and they should regard themselves as primarily trustees of the people's money and not as men whose first duty is to make money for their stockholders and themselves. After our recent experience, pretty nearly everybody, including bankers, will agree about these things. Those who know Mr. Meyer know that these have been his views for a good many years, and he has not hesitated to make them known. It is one reason he is not greatly beloved by certain heads—and former heads—of certain great New York banks. A man who tells you, personally, that you are paying yourself too much salary does not, as a rule, endear himself to you. That is exactly what Mr. Meyer told more than one of them.

STABILIZATION OF THE MEASURE OF VALUE

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred an article by Professor Warren, of Cornell University, on Stabilization of the Measure of Value. This article has been released for publication by the Committee for the Nation and endorsed by outstanding leaders of finance, business, and education throughout the Nation.

Because of the widespread interest it has already aroused I am asking that it be printed to make it more available for those who may be better versed in matters of finance than I am.

We are all becoming more aware of the importance of gold and its movements in international finance. Last year France almost forced us off the gold standard when she withdrew her deposits in New York in anticipation of an embargo on gold. The history of the gold movements in the last few years is such as to lead us to one of two possible conclusions, either—

First. Establish an international gold pool through international agreement; or Second. Attempt to establish a ratio of domestic gold to domestic goods through revaluation or embargo, or both.

Professor Warren presents a powerful argument in favor of maintaining a ratio of gold supply and demand to demand and supply of goods.

There being no objection, the article was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STABILIZATION OF THE MEASURE OF VALUE

(G. F. Warren, professor of agricultural economics and farm management, Cornell University, Ithaca, N.Y.)

So little is known about the causes of the present depression that it is necessary to dispose of some popular illusions before starting a discussion of the subject. Correct diagnosis is the first step in medicine and economics. (A fuller discussion of this subject with extended statistical evidence is now available in the book on Prices, by G. F. Warren and F. A. Pearson.)

OVERPRODUCTION NOT THE TROUBLE

Throughout history a decline in prices due to monetary causes has always popularly been attributed to overproduction, without stopping to look at the facts. For 75 years before the war the production of food and feed crops in the United States increased at the compound rate of 3.02 percent per year. From 1915–29 it increased only 0.6 percent per year. If correction is made for the reduced number of horses and mules, the rate of increase is 1.17 percent per year. We have had surpluses and shortages of some crops owing to the weather, but there is no evidence of general overproduction.

Total production of all commodities per capita in the United States increased for 75 years before the war at the rate of 1.73 percent per year, but from 1915–29 increased only 0.64 percent.

For 75 years before the war world physical volume of production of all basic commodities rose 3.15 percent per year. Since 1915 the rate has been distinctly less. Instead of the phenomenal increase in output which is popularly imagined, the rate of increase in output has declined. Stocks are in some cases piling up because of unemployment, but these are results of the depression rather than its cause.

TOO MUCH EFFICIENCY NOT THE TROUBLE

Having accepted the erroneous idea that overproduction is the cause, many unemployed engineers have turned to economics with about the same success that economists would have in building bridges. They have been deluded by the apparent efficiency in factories into thinking that the needs of humanity can be supplied by a few hours of work per week. Division of labor leads to erroneous conclusions as to increases in efficiency, because only a part of the process is visible. A farmer with a tractor, tractor equipment, a combine, and a truck is able to grow and harvest much more wheat than was formerly grown per farmer. The increase in efficiency is far less than is assumed, because there has been a change in the residence of those whose time is required to produce the wheat. Many invisible persons are involved in the production of machinery and fuel that the farmer uses.

Statements are commonly made of the spectacular increase in the output of shoes per worker in the shoe factory. These are misleading. The labor on a pair of shoes includes a part of the time of the persons growing cattle and handling, marketing, and skinning them, labor involved in the handling, shipping, and tanning of hides, and labor involved in the handling and shipping of leather. Some workers must make the machinery used in these industries; others must make the buildings and the building materials involved in this endless process. Still others must finance the business. Back of these there is the mining of coal, the building of railroads and of electrical lines and electrical equipment, and the production of cotton and tanning materials. To complete the process the shoes must be shipped and sold at retail. This involves the time of more bank clerks, railroad employees, traveling salesmen, retail salesmen, delivery boys, store builders, and paper-box manufacturers, and further fuel and light. Finally the shoes are fitted to the buyer's foot. No mass production has done away with the consumer's desire to try on several pair. It is not probable that any sudden decrease in the time required has occurred in the complete process.

We have no indication of any sudden increase in total production of all commodities per capita at any time in history. There are sudden decreases, such as occurred in 1921 and 1931, when millions of workers were unemployed.

TOO MUCH DEMOCRACY NOT THE TROUBLE

By specialization each of us produces so much of something that each of us can have more of everything. The battery that keeps this modern machine running is the medium of exchange—money. When money is stable in value the machine works well. When inflation occurs it runs too fast. When deflation occurs it stalls. Since the exchange of goods is stopped unemployment occurs and there is starvation in the midst of plenty.

The millions of unemployed in cities would like to produce goods that the farmers want in exchange for food. The farmers would like to exchange food for things that these unemployed persons would gladly produce. But the medium of exchange has broken down. It has also broken down as between workers within the cities. The unemployed capenter would like to build a house for the unemployed textile worker, who, in turn, would like to make textiles in exchange for house rent. But since the exchange system has broken down both are unemployed. In some cases we have reversion to barter, but our civilization is too complex to allow this to go far.

Most of us believe in a society organized on the basis of individual initiative; that is, a capitalistic society. The operation of such a society depends on the medium of exchange. When the medium of exchange fails to function the organization of society that depends on this medium is attacked. If we cannot invent a stable measure of value there is danger of forcing some kind of a socialistic state that will attempt to regulate distribution by Government action.

When the battery of an automobile fails to function we should get a new battery rather than turn to a wheelbarrow. If we are to discard automobile transportation it should be on the merits of the automobile and not on the accident of a defective battery. If we are to adopt state capitalism, socialism, or communism, it should be on the relative merits of these systems rather than because of a failure of the medium of exchange to function properly. The thing to correct is not the organization of society but the tool that is not working properly.

NOT A BUSINESS CYCLE

The depression is not a business cycle, although several violent business cycles can occur before adjustment is made to the collapsed price structure.

WHAT IS PRICE?

Once upon a time a farmer found that he could get 23 hogs for 60 sheep. At a later time he found that it required 120 sheep. Why the change? If there were time to question you individually some of you would say that there were too many sheep at the second date. Others would say that there were too few hogs. Others would give the correct answer, that we do not know. There might have been too many sheep or a reduced demand for them; or there might have been too few hogs or a high demand for them. There are many other possibilities. There might have been a shortage of both sheep and hogs, but a greater shortage of hogs; or there might have been a surplus of both sheep and hogs but a greater surplus of sheep. The only way to determine the cause of the changed relation is to compare sheep and hogs with many other things. Suppose we find that hogs exchange for twice the former amount of innumerable things. Who would then be so foolish as to attempt to explain the changed ratio as due to the supply of sheep? But if we change the 23 head of hogs to 23.22 grains of gold and change the sheep to pounds of wheat, practically everyone says at once that there is an overproduction of wheat. If a bushel of wheat (60 pounds) exchanges for 23.22 grains of gold (otherwise named $1), and if at a later time it takes 2 bushels of wheat to get the dollar, we blissfully explain it as too much wheat.

There are four factors in price, not two as is commonly supposed. This error has been the cause of innumerable business failures and of much foolish legislation. The price of wheat is the ratio of the supply of wheat and demand for it to the supply of gold and the demand for it.

Our present measure of value is a given weight of a single commodity, the value of which changes with the supply of this commodity and the demand for it in precisely the same way as the value of any other commodity changes.

The "money illusion" is as thoroughly dominant in this generation as was the illusion of a flat earth about which the sun revolved in the time of Galileo. It is almost as dangerous for an economist to challenge the money illusion as it was for Galileo to threaten the foundations of civilization by saying that the earth revolved.

RELATIONSHIP OF GOLD TO PRICES

For 75 years before the war world monetary stocks of gold divided by total production of other things equaled prices in England. During the war prices on a gold basis doubled. How did this occur? For the very simple reason that most of the world abandoned the gold standard and stopped bidding for gold. Gold, therefore, moved to the few places where it was freely purchased. The low demand reduced its value, just as the demonetization of silver reduced its value.

When the various countries attempted to return to a gold basis, the increased demand raised the value of gold. France returned to a gold basis June 25, 1928; and the gold panic was soon on. Now 31 countries have given up the effort to maintain a fixed price on gold. But they are still bidding for the world's gold supply. It is possible that they will definitely demonetize gold and stop bidding for it and make it cheap again, but this is not probable. The value of gold is determined by world supply and world demand, not by location.

To keep pace with business the world gold stocks must increase as rapidly as the production of other commodities, or about 3.15 percent per year. But the increased use of gold in industry is about as rapid as the growth of business. In order to increase the world monetary stocks by 3.15 percent per year, it is necessary that the production be 5.6 percent of stocks, the additional amount being necessary for industrial uses. This would call for production of about 32,000,000 ounces this year. The actual production is about three fourths of this amount.

The present rate of gold production would result in a gradual decline in prices even if there had been no war. But our major difficulty results from changes in the demand for gold.

During the many years when there was a low demand for gold our debt, tax, and business structure became fairly well adjusted to a commodity price level about 50 percent above pre-war. We are, therefore, in the position of having a world gold supply of only about two thirds the amount required to support the price level to which business is adjusted, provided the former gold-using countries continue to bid for gold. This situation results in such a frantic demand to get gold that even the gold supply which we have is used inefficiently.

Recognizing that the low value of gold was due to low world demand which would probably be temporary, I have since 1918 been giving many lectures and writing many bulletins indicating the expectation that gold would return to its pre-war value or higher. This expectation still holds. If all the former gold-using countries return to the gold basis, and if the United States continues to maintain its present monetary standard, it is to be expected that commodity prices will average below pre-war for the next 10 years. Extremely violent price fluctuations will be expected as each country attempts to secure and maintain more than its pre-war share of the world's gold supply. Each country needs about 50 percent more than its pre-war share of the total.

DEBTS

In 1929 public and private debts in the United States amounted to about 203 billion dollars. The National Industrial Conference Board estimated the national wealth at that time as 362 billion dollars. Since then, public debts have steadily increased; but private debts have been reduced somewhat by bankruptcies and payment. The total is now estimated at about 174 billions, or nearly one half the value of the property in 1929. What the property is worth compared with 1929 most of you can guess. At the present price level the debts represent so close to the value of the property that a large part of them can never be paid.

DEFLATION OR REFLATION?

The price level must be raised to the debt level, or the debt level must be lowered to the price level. This is a matter of grim reality that cannot be cured by psychology, confidence, or Government lending.

We must choose between deflation and reflation. No country likes to change its monetary system, nor does any country like to go through wholesale bankruptcies and continue to have millions of unemployed. Our choice is not between two desirable things. It is between two undesirable things. Merely raising the well-known objections to either procedure does not commend the other. The question is, Which is worse?

If we wish to go through with deflation, we may as well proceed with the bankruptcies, foreclosures, and public defaults and get them over with. Merely postponing by lending some money or attempting to hold up the price of this or that thing will accomplish very little.

DEFLATION

If deflation is completed, the following are some of the innumerable adjustments yet to be made.

At the new price levels, public and private debts are nearly equal to the national wealth. These debts will have to be reduced. The only plan thus far proposed for reducing them is bankruptcy and private adjustment. This will probably require 3 or 4 years for the major adjustment and a generation to complete the process. While the more serious part of this is taking place, bankrupt homes, farms, and other properties will always be for sale at less than new costs of construction, regardless of how low these costs may fall. Therefore, little building of any kind is to be expected. Consequently most of the basic industries will operate at low capacity and severe unemployment will be continuous. Business cycles in such a period will be suppressed cycles.

The vigorous efforts to reduce taxes will do well if they succeed in making cuts equal to the new taxes necessary to feed the unemployed. Some shifting from real estate to other forms of taxation may occur.

Public debts will increase and some of the Government units will find it impossible to meet their obligations. It will be years before taxpayers get these debts paid.

Adjusting a price level down requires much more time than adjusting it up. It is not difficult to adjust public and private debts to a higher price level, but it is very difficult to reduce them. To adjust debts up merely requires that the usual purchases be made at the new price level with the usual percentage of credit transactions. To adjust debts down means the slow process of bankruptcy. Bankruptcy acts like a house of cards—each bankruptcy starts another.

Bank deposits will decline because of the reduced amount of business and the lower prices at which business is done and the tendency to use cash rather than checks. This latter movement is encouraged by fear of banks, lack of banks, lower interest payments on deposits, charges for checks, taxes on checks, and high postage rates. Many further bank failures will occur.

Because of severe unemployment some workers are working for extremely low wages, but it is not to be expected that the general wage level will decline to the price level. The long-time tendency is for wages to rise as the output per worker increases. Whenever the debts are liquidated so that business can proceed wages will be far above pre-war.

Interest rates will be much below pre-war for safe securities, but a large part of the business will be on such a precarious basis that, for some years, rates for agriculture and industry may be high. Interest payments on bank deposits will be decidedly reduced. It will be impossible for life-insurance companies, universities, hospitals, and other institutions that depend on investments to keep up their incomes. Life-insurance rates will probably rise. The average size of policies will be reduced.

The size of fire-insurance policies will be reduced, losses will be increased, and rates probably will be raised.

Innumerable prices which have not declined will fall. Some of these are freight rates, telephone charges, price of newspapers, doctors' fees, dentists' fees, and telegraph charges.

Large numbers of corporations will disappear by bankruptcy or by combination to avoid bankruptcy.

Wholesale writing-down of the capital of industrial plants, farms, and city real estate will be necessary.

Costs of distribution will gradually decline so that prices paid to farmers will again come into adjustment with the prices which they pay. Much of this can be done in a half dozen years. Probably it can be completed in a generation.

Some basic commodity prices have fallen too low even for the conditions and will rise.

Innumerable measures will be tried in attempts to hold up prices of this or that thing. Tariffs, bounties, farm boards, domestic allotments, restrictions on trade between States under sanitary and other guises, pools, gentlemen's agreements, and many others will continue to be tried. Some of these may do a little good, but they will continue to result in disillusion and disappointment. Maintaining the present price of gold means bringing the whole debt and price structure down. To attempt to hold each individual thing up and yet bring down the whole is like sinking a ship but attempting to hold up each rivet and doorknob in it.

Nothing is gained by minimizing the gravity of the situation. Repeated confidence statements cannot change the facts. They discredit leadership and cause losses to innumerable individuals through false hopes. While the country has never before experienced as great deflation as we are now attempting, we have had experiences which indicate the probable length of the deflation disease. It usually takes 6 or 7 years to go far enough with the bankrupting process so that construction can begin, and it takes many more years fully to complete the process.

If we are going through with deflation, debt-adjustment commissions are desirable to operate for a number of years. The legal system of writing down debts works badly enough when only a few bankrupt properties are thrown on the market. It destroys values for both the creditors and lenders when applied in a wholesale way. A creditor often takes over a home or a farm, keeps it in hopes of a sale until the carrying charges eat up much of the value. In the meantime, the property depreciates. Finally in despair a shoestring sale is often made to a less desirable buyer than the dispossessed owner. Debt-adjustment commissions should study each case and make recommendations for settlement for all creditors. Such recommendations from a disinterested party would save many owners and help many lenders and would keep many of the cases out of the courts. If the Government lending agencies wish to lend more money they will do more good by taking up the safer part of the underlying mortgages in such cases than by direct loans to the lending corporations, which do not get at the root of the trouble.

While it is not the purpose of this discussion to consider what the individual can do for himself, I should like to insert one piece of advice to the millions of farmers and city home owners who are losing their homes and lifetime savings. If one has a good farm it seems to me that the best thing to do is to retain possession of it as long as possible in the hope that some temporary rise in prices, or possibly a monetary change, will enable him to keep the property. If he gives up, the savings are surely gone. He has little to lose from holding on as long as any slight chance remains.

The man who has failed in business or is out of work is blamed for it, and he often blames himself. This is adding insult to injury. Most of the failures are not due to unsound business but to unstable money, for which no individual is to blame. The farmer or business man who has failed should not be despondent or commit suicide. He should feel like a man who has just gone through a tornado, stripped of his property but escaped with his life. His family and friends should treat him accordingly.

It is not improbable that the high value of gold will result in discoveries of it so that a later generation will have inflation.

The general attitude of the public seems to be to prefer to write everything down in terms of gold rather than raise the price of gold. The strain on public credit to feed unemployed persons and the social confusion from such general bankruptcies may make it impossible to complete the process. No such violent deflation has yet been carried through by any modern nation.

If the process is carried through, a new generation can be prosperous—except as foolish laws remain to plague it. Any price level is satisfactory after business is adjusted to it.

REFLATION

The effect of rising prices is the same regardless of the cause. If for any reason the price level is restored, it does not mean that all prices will rise equally. Many prices have not declined or have declined little. Restoring the price level would relieve them of the necessity of declining. The major ones are debts and taxes. If commodity prices were raised, buying would begin, because rising prices cause buying. Jobs would be available. Houses would be in demand. The debts and taxes on the houses and farms could be paid and the debts would not have to be cut by bankruptcy.

The former amount of life insurance would be desired.

Many charges, such as freight rates, doctors' fees, telephone rates, and the like, are already adjusted to the price level that would be established. They would not rise but would be relieved from falling.

Costs of distribution would rise very little. Therefore prices paid to farmers and other producers would rise much more than retail prices. This would bring farm prices into adjustment with other prices. It is sometimes said that two steps are necessary—first, restore the price level; and second, restore the relationships of farm prices to other prices. If the first step is taken, the second follows automatically.

Prices of basic commodities, such as copper, corn, wheat, and cotton, would rise very decidedly, because they are so far below the price level that would be restored.

The declines in values of homes and farms would be stopped.

In general, the prices that have not yet declined would be relieved from declining, and those that have declined would be restored.

Probably nothing is more universally wished for than a rise in commodity prices. We are willing to have the Farm Board buy wheat and cotton, pile tariff on tariff, lend billions of Government money—all in the hope that commodity prices may rise. But when any proposal is put forward that will raise the whole price level it is commonly considered sacrilegious. There is probably no other subject on which so many people have formed positive convictions without scientific evidence. It is the responsibility of farm organizations to give consideration to the various possible methods of procedure.

When a city is on fire, there are only two ways to proceed. One is to let it burn itself out and get ready for the next generation to build a new city; the other is to attempt to put out the fire, even at the risk of some damage from water. Perhaps I should mention a third way of trying to dispose of it by saying that it does not exist.

Since the general level of commodity prices is the reciprocal of the value of money, there is no way to raise the price level except as the value of money declines or is lowered by law.

WHAT STABILIZATION MEANS

Stabilizing the commodity price level does not mean that any single commodity will be free from fluctuations in price due to the supply of it or the demand for it. It does mean that commodity prices as a whole may be freed from being swept up or down as a mass due either to world supply of gold or frantic changes in the demand for it. There are many proposals for limited or complete stabilization.

CREDIT EXPANSION

A gradual and slow increase in the amount of monetary circulation plus bank deposits per dollar of gold in the United States has been taking place for many years. There is no indication that the Federal Reserve System has speeded up this normal growth of circulation plus credit per dollar of gold. Whenever the normal is much exceeded a reaction occurs.

Some persons believe that the Federal Reserve System is to blame for the decline in prices and that there is gold enough to maintain predeflation prices if credit were properly managed. The evidence indicates that a rise in the value of gold was inevitable with the return of the world-wide demand for it. Credit management might have prevented a part of the stock-market boom. No evidence has been found that credit management could have prevented a decline in commodity prices or that the 1929 commodity prices can be restored by credit management and still maintain the present price of gold.

By the management of credit it is possible to throw commodity prices out of line with gold by a limited amount. There is no indication that any permanent change in this relationship can be accomplished in this way. Overexpansion of credit brings on a reaction, and so does overcontraction of credit. The policy of the Federal Government in 1932 was based on the theory that prices could be raised by credit. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation lent money to many agencies in the expectation that credit expansion by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Federal Reserve banks would raise prices and restore equities back of securities and start business activity. The policy did check contraction, at least temporarily; but only a rise in the price structure can stop bankruptcies and start employment. It is not possible to expand credit sufficiently to do this and still maintain the present price of gold.

CURRENCY EXPANSION

It is very easy to raise the price level by an expansion of the currency, but any expansion that is sufficient to restore the prices of commodities to the debt level would make it impossible to continue to redeem each of the paper dollars with 23.22 grains of gold. There is no way of printing paper money that will make it possible materially to change the relative values of gold and commodities.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

By adopting bimetallism or symmetallism it is possible to set any price level that is desired. If silver is remonetized, it should certainly be done by symmetalism, as proposed by the great English economist, Alfred Marshall. This proposal is now receiving considerable attention in England. It is very simple. Instead of having a dollar exchange for 23.22 grains of gold, it would exchange for some given weight of gold plus a given weight of silver. Since two commodities are more stable than one, and since silver production is less erratic than gold production, such a money would be more stable than gold. If once established, it would work in the same way in which the gold standard works, except for greater stability.

REVALUATION

Most of the Continent of Europe has reduced the weight of gold in the monetary unit. It is probable that England and the 30 other countries that have suspended the gold standard will do the same. If so, this will leave the United States as one of the very few countries that attempts to maintain the pre-war price of gold regardless of the supply of it or demand for it.

France reduced the weight of gold in the franc by four fifths, so that when our prices are 100 her price level is about 500. The present outlook is that England will probably reduce the amount of gold in the pound by 30–50 percent. The United States reduced the weight of gold in the dollar by 6.25 percent in 1834. By reducing the weight of gold in the dollar any desired price level can be established. The future course of prices would depend on future supply of gold and future demand for it.

MANAGED CURRENCY

Two proposals have been advanced to provide for a permanently stable measure of value. One of these proposes a managed currency to be controlled by central banks in such a way as to keep the average of commodity prices stable. To operate such a system requires willingness and intelligence in the bank management, and freedom from influence by politics or desire for profits.

At innumerable times in history, the gold standard has broken down and a managed currency has been substituted. After great revolutions such as the American Revolution, the French Revolution, and the German Revolution at attempts to pay reparations, nations were so completely bankrupt that their currencies were "not worth a continental."

At innumerable other times, after the failure of the gold standard, a managed currency has been operated with a considerable degree of success. England had such a currency from 1915 to 1925 and has had such a currency since September 1931. Prices in England since she left the gold standard have been more stable than prices here. Apparently, such a country as England could permanently operate such a currency successfully. The possibility of a managed currency should not be judged entirely by its success or failure when conditions are so bad that the gold standard has failed.

THE COMPENSATED DOLLAR

The compensated dollar is a proposal to establish by law a currency redeemable in gold, but the weight of gold for which the dollar would exchange would vary with the index number of wholesale prices of all commodities; that is, if prices rose 1 percent, the weight of gold for which the dollar would exchange would rise 1 percent. If prices fell 1 percent, the dollar would exchange for 1 percent less gold. The gold would be kept in bars in the Treasury and central banks. This would keep the dollar stable in buying power for the average of all commodities.

The dollar has to be rubber either as to weight or as to value. It cannot have a fixed weight and also have a fixed value. This proposal would give it a fixed value and a rubber weight. It raises the fundamental question as to whether a medium of exchange should be fixed in weight or fixed in value.

A scientific money is one with a contant buying power for all commodities rather than a fixed weight of one commodity. Our whole tax and debt structure rests on commodity prices. If this structure is to be kept sound either for the creditor or the debtor, it is commodity prices that need to be kept stable, not the weight of gold for which a dollar will exchange.

THE GOLD CLAUSE

A considerable number of bonds in the United States call for payment in a gold dollar of present weight and fineness. This does not apply to Federal land-bank bonds or mortgages, nor to most of the mortgages of joint-stock land banks and life-insurance companies. These agencies agree to pay their creditors in lawful money and are therefore protected if they collect lawful money from their debtors.

The problem today is not whether creditors will be paid in any particular brand of a dollar, but whether they will get anything. Sometimes they get less than nothing, for they get a non-income-paying property with delinquent taxes. If the dollar is revalued, Congress will probably invalidate such contracts or, if this is considered to be unconstitutional, can easily tax the profits derived from such a source by a sufficient amount to prevent collection.

If the price level were restored, business would proceed, jobs would be available, taxpayers would be relieved of feeding millions of unemployed, and it would be easier to pay one third more than the bond calls for than it now is to pay the present sum.

The gold clause is probably of little value to any creditor and even if enforced it is a minor matter when considering the innumerable effects of deflation. Ten million unemployed is a far more serious matter than the gold clause.

If we continue to allow our whole price and debt structure to be based on accidental discoveries of some one commodity or the accidents of demand for it, we should not be surprised to see the social system that depends on such an unstable medium of exchange seriously threatened. The present revolutions and political upheavals in the world are the direct and indirect results of a break-down in the medium of exchange. If such a monetary system continues, every investor, farmer, home owner, and business man should give first attention to the probable supplies of and demand for gold, before he considers the details of his business.

Committee for the Nation's summary of the "five next steps" sent with the entire text in proof form to the press of the United States and all agricultural papers on April 6, 1933:

SUMMARY

To Editors:

An embargo on gold exports and suspension of specie payments as first steps prerequisite to rebuilding the price level and restarting business were urged in February by the Committee for the Nation.

These two steps were among the first acts of the Roosevelt administration. The favorable effects, however, experienced in other countries of suspending specie payments have so far been thwarted in the United States through exchange restrictions. These have the mistaken purpose of keeping our dollar abroad up at gold parity, which acts to hold down our domestic price level.

The committee's recommendation to the President and Congress of five next steps to rebuild prices and restore purchasing power includes immediate discontinuance of such exchange restrictions.

The five steps, briefly summarized, are:

1. Reopening of maximum number of banks by a very liberal use of powers granted under the emergency banking legislation, and maintenance of confidence through protection of the banks reopened as sound.

2. Continuance of the embargo on gold export and suspension of specie payment. Consultation with Great Britain with a view to simultaneous return to the gold standard; each nation, however, to determine for itself a basis that will give it a satisfactory domestic price level.

3. Discontinuance of efforts to keep the dollar at its former gold parity. We must resume the free dealing in sterling and other foreign exchange. If this does not suffice, the United States should sell dollar exchange to depress the price so that foreign countries can acquire it at lower cost to pay their debts to us and use it in buying goods from American agriculture and industry.

4. Announcement that before lifting the gold embargo the United States Treasury will revalue gold; an arbitrary temporary increase of 75 percent—from $20.67 to $36.17 per ounce—is recommended as sufficient to restore prices to the level of 1926. This would have the effect of reducing Europe's debt to us, in terms of gold, by more than 40 percent.

5. Creation of a nonpartisan board to stabilize the United States general wholesale price level at 100—where it stood in 1926—and to steady the dollar at a desirable level after allowing foreign currencies to rise in comparison with dollar exchange.

COMMITTEE FOR THE NATION,

INVESTIGATION OF CAUSES OF DIRIGIBLE DISASTERS

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, on day before yesterday the House passed a concurrent resolution (H.Con.Res. 15) providing for an investigation of the wreck of the Akron and other dirigibles by a joint committee, consisting of five Members of the Senate and five Members of the House, the members of the joint committee to be appointed by the Presiding Officers of the respective Houses. This morning the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs met and unanimously directed a favorable report of the concurrent resolution. On behalf of the committee I now report the House concurrent resolution and ask unanimous consent to have 5 minutes in which to have it considered and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution just reported by him.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am not advised as to the contents of the resolution.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have just related the contents of it.

Mr. McNARY. I was unable to hear all the Senator said. I think I shall have to object to taking up any other business at this time until we dispose of the unfinished business, and particularly of the pending amendment. Entertaining that view, I will have to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The Chair is advised that under the rule the concurrent resolution should be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and, without objection, that reference will be made.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 1318) granting a pension to Mary L. Bryant (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DILL:

A bill (S. 1319) to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign-trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BRATTON:

A bill (S. 1321) authorizing adjustment of the claim of Korber Realty, Inc.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NEELY:

A bill (S. 1322) granting a pension to Fletcher M. Boso; and

A bill (S. 1323) granting a pension to Phoebe L. Ray; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON:

A bill (S. 1324) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 1325) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 1326) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 1327) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana:

A bill (S. 1328) to provide for the donation of certain Army equipment to posts of the American Legion; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 1329) granting a pension to Anna R. Robbins; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McGILL:

A bill (S. 1330) authorizing an appropriation for the continuation of certain hearings by the Interstate Commerce Commission; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 1331) for the relief of Elsie Segar, administratrix of C. M. A. Sorensen and of Holger E. Sorensen (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McCARRAN:

A bill (S. 1332) to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of unemployment through the performance of useful public work, and for other purposes", approved March 31, 1933; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. GEORGE:

A joint resolution (S.J.Res. 41) to provide for the publication of certain transactions in cotton on boards of trade and exchanges; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

INTERSTATE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill and have it referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and also that the statement accompanying the bill may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the committee.

The bill (S. 1320) to provide compensation for disability or death resulting from injury to employees in interstate commerce, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The statement presented by Mr. WAGNER to accompany the bill was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION FOR INTERSTATE-COMMERCE EMPLOYEES

Twenty years ago a congressional committee reported voluminously in favor of a workmen's compensation act for railway employees injured in interstate commerce. There was substantial agreement between railroad employers and railroad workers in favor of compensation legislation, but the official commission bill, although passed in modified form by both Houses of Congress, was permitted to die.

Meanwhile workmen's compensation has been almost universally adopted in this country to replace the antiquated system of employers' liability suits for damages. Interstate-commerce employees comprise the most important group of workers remaining without this modern protection, which experience has demonstrated to be for the best interests of employers, employees, and the whole community.

In January 1932, at the joint meeting of representatives of railway operators and railway unions, steps were taken looking toward earnest consideration of action by Congress on a Federal workmen's compensation law for interstate-commerce employees.

On June 23, 1932, I introduced the proposed Federal Interstate Workmen's Compensation Act, drafted by the American Association for Labor Legislation in cooperation with representatives of the groups most directly affected and with the assistance of compensation administrators throughout the country. I did this in order that there might be a concrete plan available for consideration. This bill was again submitted to compensation administrators, representatives of the transportation unions, legal advisers, and others for criticism and suggestions. Following extensive correspondence and numerous conferences, approximately 25 improving amendments were made to the bill by the association, and it was reintroduced in revised form on February 27, 1933, as S. 5695. This revised draft was again referred for study to compensation experts and those directly affected, including representatives of railroad carriers and representatives of the unions. Final perfecting adjustments recommended as a result of this latest submission, were incorporated in the bill before its introduction at the present session of Congress.

This proposed act follows somewhat closely the well-tested Federal Longshoremen's Act of 1927 and is to be administered by the existing United States Employees' Compensation Commission, augmented by two additional commissioners, one to represent employers in interstate commerce and one to represent employees in interstate commerce. Costs of administration are prorated among insurance carriers, including self-insurers, as is done in New York and a number of other States including Delaware, Georgia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, North Carolina, Texas, and Virginia.

From the general welfare viewpoint as well as a matter of simple justice to injured workers in interstate commerce and their employers, the time should be no longer delayed for the enactment of this modern scientific accident legislation.

MUSCLE SHOALS—AMENDMENT

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to Senate bill 1272, the Muscle Shoals bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE—AMENDMENTS

Mr. VANDENBERG and Mr. HATFIELD each submitted an amendment and Mr. COSTIGAN submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing purchasing power, which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

INVESTIGATION OF CHANGES IN THE CURRENCY SYSTEM

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask leave to submit a resolution, to have it read, printed, and lie on the table. At the first opportunity I shall call it up and ask for its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The resolution (S.Res. 61) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas it is the sense of the Senate that economic and financial conditions require a change in our currency system for the purpose of raising commodity prices and restoring normal debt-paying power: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency is hereby instructed to investigate the following methods of bringing about the objectives above stated:

First. Reducing the number of grains of gold in the dollar.

Second. Issuance of Federal Reserve bank notes or Federal Reserve notes.

Third. Retirement of Government bonds and the issuance of Treasury notes in payment for same.

Fourth. Remonetization of silver or other use of silver.

Fifth. Issuance of stamp money.

Sixth. Any other method or plan the committee may decide should be investigated.

The committee is instructed to report within 30 days its findings to the Senate and present a bill or bills which, in the judgment of the committee, will best accomplish the objectives stated in the preamble of this resolution.
